What is the power of Federal patronage under the new conditions of a presidential primary? The old plan of electing Senators within the next 60 days will have become a thing of the past. The constitutional amendment that we submitted last year for the direct election of Senators will probably be ratified by the necessary three-fourths of the States during the present sessions of the different legislatures. Whether it is or is not ratified, the manner of electing Senators, as a matter of fact, has already been relegated to a direct vote of the people under the primary systems in vogue in a majority of the States.

You are submitting a proposed amendment that the people of this country have not demanded, and you are doing it under the whip and spur of possible presidential candidates. Eliminate their individual ambition and the agitation for the one-term President would disappear like the morning mist.

I think I may offer another amendment to this resolution. The argument for it is just as valid as is the argument for the one term for the Presidency. If we are going to have a one-term President, why not follow it up and have a one-term Senator?

Any Senator who has served in this Chamber knows the great power, the great wisdom, the great efficiency, that come from long-time service in this body. Would any Senator argue that a Senator who has served two terms or three terms here is less patriotic than those of us who have served one term? The human intelligence revolts, Senators, against that kind of an argument.

Does any man believe that Abraham Lincoln was less patriotic during his second term than during his first? Was Jackson less effective as a President, was he less patriotic, during his second term than his first? Was McKinley or Madison or Monroe or Grant or any other man who has ever yet held that great office for more than one term less patriotic during his second than his first term?

The American people will take care of the election of a President. You need have no fear on that ground. You are offering something that is not demanded by the people, except the agitation that largely flows from personal ambition.

Do you, Democratic Senators, want to embarrass your incoming President, the first you have had for 16 years, by a resolution of the Senate which says to Woodrow Wilson, "No matter how good a President you may be during the next four years, no matter how effective you may be in administering that great trust, no matter how much you are entitled to the reward of a vote of confidence of your countrymen, at the end of that four-year term, in order to provide an opportunity for certain other politicians and statesmen who want to be President, we will now foreclose any hope that you may have for the reward that comes from work well done"?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. DIXON. With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The President elect, Woodrow Wilson, has declared in most positive terms his adherence in the wisdom and the good sense of the people in favor of one term, and the great Democratic Party that assembled at Baltimore declared in favor of one term. Of course that term was supposed to be a four-year term. A very great body of the people of the United States have ratified that through Mr. Wilson's election. So I feel that the Senator may leave Woodrow Wilson out of the controversy.

Mr. DIXON. Does the Senator from New Jersey, the home State of the President elect, speak ex cathedra when he states that Woodrow Wilson would not have a second term?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. He has so declared in a public way not to myself; and he is a man of convictions as we all know, and a man who generally can be relied upon and believed in any statement he has advanced. He has so declared, and our party has declared in most unmistakable terms in favor of one term.

Mr. DIXON. I merely wanted to inquire, and that was why I directed my remarks first to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER], whether or not Woodrow Wilson has made any public declaration that he would not be a candidate for a second term.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Not in words, but he has declared on two or three occasions his judgment in the wisdom of one term.

Mr. DIXON. Was that declaration made before or after his nomination at Baltimore?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I think before his nomination; but he is a man of so much stability of character that you can understand he has not shifted overnight. My friend and the country may have implicit faith and reliance in his declarations as being the result of deliberate judgment.

Mr. DIXON. Can the Senator from New Jersey now refer me to any specific declaration at any specific time by the President elect?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am at a loss at this moment to give you that reference.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey, who I doubt not is fully in the confidence of the President elect, whether or not immediately preceding the nomination at Baltimore there was any understanding between the President elect and a distinguished citizen of Nebraska regarding his future attitude in this matter, in the event of his nomination?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I can set the Senator at rest on that. I was not in conference previous to the Baltimore convention nor since it with the President elect.

Mr. DIXON. I understand, Mr. President, that at the other end of the Capitol there are two or three distinguished gentlemen holding strategic positions in that legislative branch of the Government who are waiting and anxious and willing for the passage of this resolution by the Senate in order to expedite its passage through the House before the termination of the present session of Congress.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have no knowledge of any such desire.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from New Jersey refers to the declaration of his party platform. Does the Senator know who was the author of that celebrated plank in the platform of the Baltimore convention?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am not prepared to state who was the author. I think no single individual.

Mr. DIXON. I happen to hold in my hand——

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. DIXON. With pleasure.

Mr. PAYNTER. If the Senator desires to know, I can state what has been publicly stated in some of the newspapers of Kentucky.

Mr. DIXON. I do not believe that the newspapers of Kentucky would be competent witnesses on this very personal question.

Mr. PAYNTER. I will give the Senator the information, and he can give such credit to it as he desires. It has been stated by some of the papers in Kentucky that ex-Gov. Beckham wrote that clause in the platform. I have no personal knowledge whatever on the subject.

Mr. DIXON. A Senator on my left remarks that he understood the name of the real author of that special plank in the platform begins with "B," but it is not Beckham, and he does not reside in Kentucky. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky if he ever heard any rumors of that kind?

Mr. PAYNTER. Is the Senator from Montana asking me a question? I will say to the Senator I do not desire to engage in any speculation which would deprive Kentucky of any honor to which she is entitled.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I have here the "platforms of the two great political parties." That must be a misprint. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] passed this up to me. I suspect there must be a misprint where it says "platforms of the two great political parties."

Mr. O'GORMAN. It was printed before the last election.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from New York relieves my embarrassment. He says this book was printed before the last election. That evidently explains the typographical error, reading it in the light of the latest election returns. It says: "Platforms of the two great political parties, compiled by South Trimble, Clerk of the House of Representatives," with the date of July, 1912. I see where he made the error. This does not include the platform of the Progressive Party, which is now the second "great political party." I read from the Democratic platform:

TERM OF PRESIDENT.

We favor a single presidential term, and to that end urge the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution making the President of the United States ineligible for reelection, and we pledge the candidate of this convention to this principle.

Does not the Senator from New Jersey, on second thought, now get a clearer vision of the notion that Woodrow Wilson was for a single term? Might he not confuse it and take the Democratic platform rather than Woodrow Wilson's declaration?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I still believe and insist that President Elect Woodrow Wilson has so declared.

Mr. DIXON. Does not the Senator from New Jersey have an indistinct recollection of something spoken by Mr. Wilson in the far-distant past, when the President elect held different views on many things from what he has since he has had wider experience in national affairs, and possibly at that time he gave vent on some occasion to an ill-defined view that a single term might be better than to reelect an efficient President for a second term? I think the Senator from New Jersey will probably also be in accord with me when I say that that was before Woodrow Wilson had been President elect of the United States.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It does not militate at all against the assertion or the principle whether it was given before the election or after the election.

Mr. DIXON. Of course this plank was in the Democratic platform. That does not argue that any great percentage of the people of this country are demanding that we shall set aside the entire traditions of this Republic and declare that no efficient competent public servant can be reelected for the second time.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. But it certainly——

Mr. DIXON. The plank of this platform—and I know what platform planks have meant many times in the past——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It is certain that——

Mr. DIXON. Just let me finish what I am saying.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana has the floor.

Mr. DIXON. I remember in the Democratic platform four years prior to this one there was a specific, positive declaration for the entire removal of the tariff duties on lumber, manufactures of lumber, and print paper, and many other things that the Democratic Congressmen and Senators, when it came to final action, in no way recognized, and it was openly repudiated here on the floor of the Senate Chamber.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That does not militate at all against the assertion I made with reference to the President elect, nor does it prove anything to the contrary. The Democratic Party have declared unequivocally in this platform in favor of one term, and on every husting and in every newspaper our platform was published and republished. It was advocated by every man on the stump for the successful candidate, and acquiesced in by a majority of the votes of the people of the United States by a verdict that is sufficient in itself to be recognized as being a great public sentiment.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from New Jersey will also remember that the Democratic platforms in the past have contained many declarations about things that the American people absolutely repudiated.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is true, but they repudiated some other platforms.

Mr. DIXON. I will have to again remind the Senator from New Jersey that the American people have not indorsed that plank in the platform.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Not specifically that plank, of course. I realize that it may be argued that a majority vote of all the people of the United States was not cast for the President elect. But be that as it may, it is worth something as a verdict of public sentiment. It has not been combated by the Republican Party nor by the Progressive Party, nor has an attempt been made to stand against that specific plank in our platform.

Mr. DIXON. No; but by the wildest stretch of imagination the Senator from New Jersey would not argue that a majority or any respectable minority of the American voters have indorsed that plank, or that a majority of the American voters indorsed that platform in the election on the 5th of November. The Democratic Party polled the smallest percentage of the total vote at the last election that any political organization ever polled when it elected a President with one single exception.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. If my Progressive friend can get any comfort out of any analysis of figures, God knows he is welcome to it. However, the verdict of the people has been pretty well declared. I would say, with all dignity and with all pleasantry, the Senator from Montana might just as well accept the situation agreeably and pleasantly. The next President is to be a Democrat, and, thank God, he comes from New Jersey, and we will dispense to you justice, fairness, and humanity. We are in favor of a system of political policy that shall check even the possibility in the vaguest way of a President conniving to make secure his reelection.

The arguments which have been advanced by the Senator now on the floor in this particular case, wherein he refers to the President taking out a whole batch of nominations in order that he might parcel them out to some communities or States wherein he could gain favor, to my mind is one of the strongest reasons in the world for the policy of one term.

Mr. DIXON. That is what I have just said to the Senate, and the Senator from New Jersey evidently heard me, that that policy had resulted in his complete repudiation by the American voters, and probably had as much to do——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will address the Chair and get permission to interrupt. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. DIXON. Yes.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will not say, nor do I agree, that the defeat of Mr. Taft is entirely attributable to the particular incidents to which the Senator from Montana refers, but it was bigger and broader things than that which brought about the annihilation of the Republican Party. It was the high-tariff policy of your party that has burdened and cursed the people of this country; they have opened their eyes to the iniquity of it, and the verdict is well recorded.

Mr. DIXON. I of course do not want to go into all the causes of the present situation which put the great Republican Party in the third place in the balloting of this Nation; but I do not believe that the Senator from New Jersey is doing a patriotic thing, is doing a wise thing, in acting under the spur of personal equation, rather than looking forward a hundred years into our coming national life, gauged by the result of the past 130 years of national life, respecting the election of the Chief Executive, when he urges at this time the passage of this joint resolution, which, in the light of all human experience, will not lead to better government or to a better personnel in the future Presidents of the United States.

You propose to exempt the Presidents from every other class of men holding positions of honor and trust. I want to reiterate, finally, that there is no reason why the President of the United States, holding the most exalted position of all, with every motive leading him to a higher aspiration than any other man holding an office, should be limited to the one term, when Senators who are voting for this joint resolution would consider it an insult to their conscience and their past services if you insinuated that a Senator should have only one term, because, perchance, he might use his first term, and the patronage and influence that came with it, in order to perpetuate himself in office.

I say again, there has been far greater crime—I will not say "crime"—but there has been far greater danger to the public service from a senatorial oligarchy, a few long-term Senators holding all the strategic positions in matters of legislation, than ever flowed from the White House from any man who ever was elected the second time to the Presidency of the United States. I think, if it is in order, I also want to offer an amendment limiting the senatorial term. Let us try it out with the same square rule. If the President is limited to one term, I think we should also submit to the people of the States—they may be just as anxious for that—a proposition limiting Senators to one term in the Senate. Will the Senator from New Jersey support me in that contention?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I feel that the situation is entirely different. A Senator has no appointing power.

Mr. DIXON. A Senator, as a matter of fact, has more appointing power than the President.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, by indirection the Senator may have a degree of appointing power, but the President is the source of the appointing power.

I appreciate the splendid thoughts that were just now advanced by the Senator from Montana. I realize that I am not a man of large experience in matters of government; I am entirely new; but I also realize, and I believe the Senator will realize with me, that the best of us are but human. The President of the United States is not unlike the Senator from Montana or the Senator from New Jersey. We are all liable to err, but with that full knowledge in view I believe I am better safeguarding not only the country, but that I am better safeguarding the future, those who will come after us, by staying the possible greed for power that may come and is to-day lodged in the minds of thousands of ambitious men throughout the length and breadth of our country. I shall therefore vote to sustain the proposition of one term, not for partisan purposes or for the purpose of aiding any individual, but upon the broad principle that I am thereby better advancing the welfare of my country and the happiness and prosperity of those who may come after us.

Mr. DIXON. Then why not apply it to the senatorial term?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not know but that I might be willing to meet you on that proposition. On general principles I believe the larger the number who can come in contact with and aid in the direction of the policy of the Government the better citizenship and the better Republic we shall have. So the Senator can not stump me on that.

Mr. DIXON. Now, I see I have already made one convert. [Laughter.] It had never occurred to the Senator from New Jersey that the curse of Federal patronage, the danger of Federal patronage, lies not in the President but in the Senators and the Representatives of the United States. The Senator from New Jersey and every other Senator knows that. While we technically refer to the power of presidential appointments, does the President of the United States make an appointment in Massachusetts when the Senators from that State are in political accord with him, except on the initiative of the Senators from Massachusetts?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, I know——

Mr. DIXON. The President elect, in making his New Jersey appointments, in all human probability will take what will soon be the senior Senator from New Jersey into very strict and confidential communication. We know and the country knows that the President does not distribute patronage, but that the Senate of the United States distributes patronage.

The Members of the House of Representatives name the postmasters of the country; the Senators name the marshals, the collectors, and the Federal judges. There may be once in a while an exception to the rule. It is not the patronage of the President; it is the patronage of Representatives and Senators.

If you want to eradicate the evil, let us apply the same rule to ourselves that we are going to try to apply to the President of the United States. There is just as much argument for limiting your tenure to one term in the Senate as for limiting the President to one term. The Senator from New Jersey happily, on second thought, agrees with me. If we are going to upset the traditions of the whole history of the Republic and to eradicate for the future the possibility of second Lincolns and Washingtons and Jacksons and McKinleys, let us do it with even-handed justice, let the committee withdraw the present joint resolution, go back to the seclusion of their committee room, and report a new joint resolution proposing to amend the Constitution limiting the senatorial service to one term, the presidential service to one term, and, by the same rule, congressional service to one term, and let us submit it all to the people of the United States and see what they will have to say about it.

I have occupied much longer time than I had dreamed of doing. I desire again to reiterate that, under the old system of nominations, Federal patronage was a powerful influence in causing a nomination, but it never has been and never will be of any influence in forcing an election. One man can take a pony to the water, but 20,000 men can not make him drink.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, sometime ago I presented an amendment intended to be proposed to the joint resolution. I wish now to modify it somewhat and, if it be in order, to offer it now. If it is not in order now, then I give notice that I will offer it later.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me just for a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. For what purpose?

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to recall to the attention of the Chair the position of the amendment offered, or which I thought was offered, by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON].

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will be through in a second, but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it might make some difference, possibly, with the offering of the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi. My attention was diverted a moment ago while the Chair announced his construction of what occurred on the 15th of August last. I have always supposed that the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia would be the pending question whenever the joint resolution was under consideration. The Chair, by looking up the RECORD, will see that upon a vote in the Senate the joint resolution was taken up, and while it was under consideration Mr. BACON said:

I simply desire to offer an amendment, and I will ask the Secretary to take it down. It is on the sixth line on the second page, to strike out the word "six" and to insert the word "four." I do not ask to do anything more now than to have that entered.

The last sentence, I assume, had reference to a general understanding that the debate would not proceed at that time; but it seems to me very clear that the Senator from Georgia did offer the amendment and that it is now pending. I simply desire to keep the record straight; that is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon reconsideration of the matter, the Chair is of opinion that the Senator from Iowa is right. The Chair is informed that at a subsequent time, when the Senator from Georgia himself was in the chair, he considered that his amendment was pending.

Mr. CUMMINS. I remember that also.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And the present occupant of the chair would reverse the suggestion made a little time ago, and consider that the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia is now pending and is the question before the Senate. The amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] can be read for information, but it is not in order for consideration at the present time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the amendment and its purpose. The amendment as originally presented by me contained in the latter part phraseology which I took from the joint resolution which is pending before the Senate. So far was I from thinking that the amendment did affect anybody personally who had been a candidate for the Presidency that I did not reflect about that at all. I am very desirous that whatever amendment does pass and does go before the people shall go before them without arousing necessarily the antagonism of the followers of any man or those who have been followers of any man. The amendment as I now present it changes the original amendment, as I shall indicate. The original amendment provided:

No person who has held the office by election, or discharged its powers or duties, or acted as President by succession for any term or fraction of a term under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof shall be reeligible beyond his second term or term and a fraction.

Now, I have changed it so that it will read:

No person who shall hereafter hold the office or discharge its powers or duties—

And so forth.

The amendment, as I offer it now—and I ask the attention of Senators to it, because it is a mere putting into the Constitution of what I regard as being the unwritten law of the Republic—is to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert the following:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of President shall be four years. He shall be reeligible for one additional term of four years, and not thereafter reeligible at any time. No person who shall hereafter hold the office or discharge its powers or duties, or act as President by succession for any fraction of a term under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof shall be reeligible beyond such a fraction of a term and for one term by election.

The President, together with a Vice President chosen for the same term, shall be elected as follows.

That strikes out everything in the original amendment which might have looked as if it were intended to strike at an ex-President or an ex-candidate for the Presidency. I understand that the amendment is not now in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not now in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that it may be printed as an amendment and be pending.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question. As I understand, the Senator has now so arranged his amendment that it does not include the man who has been twice President. He would not be debarred.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I propose to offer when the time arrives for the consideration of such an amendment, to be added as a proviso at the end of line 10, on page 2, after the word "election."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas desire to have the amendment read?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I desire it to be read and printed, so that it may be pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 10, after the word "election," it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the foregoing provisions shall not affect the eligibility to reelection of the President or Vice President in office at the time of its adoption as a part of the Constitution, nor that of any person who has served in either of said offices prior thereto.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I favor the proposed amendment to the Constitution limiting the presidential term to a single period of six years. But I think it would cheapen this great public question to give it a possible personal application to any individual. The movement itself antedated the present situation of affairs with reference to the personnel of recent and probable future presidential aspirants which arose to confuse the councils of its friends.

The question itself is possessed of merits of the most far-reaching and important character. These can only be obscured and minimized by associating their discussion with the personal aspect of politics. In the present day the business of legislating, so far as it relates to the larger public questions, has been evolved into a system entirely distinct and different from that contemplated by the Constitution, and which was of every-day practice in the early days of this Government. We are gravitating more nearly to the European system of having measures of great importance projected and actively promoted by a so-called responsible ministry. They come to us in the form of a redemption of the platform promises of the party to which the President belongs, or they are deemed administration measures evolved by current demands of the public service, or subsequently adopted as party propositions.

With the power to dispense patronage, and the power to intrigue for renomination and reelection, such measures are very seriously handicapped, or they are unfairly promoted by that group of powers which the President in modern times exercises. I think the question is of sufficient magnitude by and of itself to engage the attention of Congress without having it fettered with the remotest personal aspect of the question.

Again, I do not believe that in this Republic any man is sufficiently dangerous, nor is he of sufficient importance, to be complimented by having it understood that the Constitution must be amended to get rid of him or to safeguard the interests of the Republic by excluding him from office. Common sense, patriotism, sense of justice, and the love of country will be amply sufficient to protect this country against any such alleged "bad man." I am not inclined to believe that there are any bad men offering for this office or ever likely to offer for it. There are none in existence who have occupied it who have not left behind them when they left office admirers and supporters who do not believe that the public service would have been substantially advanced in efficiency had they been continued in the office.

The recklessness and heat of political debate sometimes lead to the use in public discussion of epithets and criticisms that are far beyond the limits of fact and the proprieties with which we debate and consider questions of importance here. So my purpose in offering this amendment is to really assist in the ultimate passage of the proposition to limit the presidential office to a single term of six years, and I believe its final adoption will be very greatly promoted by incorporating in the resolution affirmative language indicating that it is not our intention to interfere with any of the merely personal features of pending political controversies.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I had prepared an amendment having the same purpose as that which has just been so well stated by the Senator from Arkansas. I think I will send it to the desk and have it read. Perhaps some Senators may prefer that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 9, after the word "thereof," it is proposed to insert—

After the 4th day of March, 1917.

Mr. ROOT. The design of that amendment is to make this resolution applicable only to those who are elected or hold office after the 4th of March, 1917.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is substantially what I intended to do; but the language I employed would fit in better, in the event the committee amendment should be adopted in lieu of the original proposition. But either will answer the purpose.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I think changing the Constitution in a matter affecting the framework of our Government is too serious to be complicated by any personal considerations. I do not think we ought to have any question about Mr. Wilson or Mr. Roosevelt or Mr. Taft or anybody else when we are considering what shall be the framework of the Government of this country for generations to come, and we should carefully exclude any possibility of such considerations.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. ROOT. Yes; I will be glad to yield.

Mr. WORKS. If the Senator is about to conclude, I will wait.

Mr. ROOT. I was about to conclude. I have said substantially what I wish to say.

The proposed change from the customary two terms, provided the same party continues in power, to a single term of six years commended itself to me. I should not be willing to limit it to one term of four years, for I think a President uses the first part of that time in getting familiar with his office, so that he reaches the point of highest efficiency, and in the last part of it his efficiency is greatly decreased by the fact that he is going out of office and his power is vanishing.

I look upon this subject from a little different point of view than that which I heard stated here; and that is from the point of governmental efficiency.

I think the possibility of renomination and reelection of a President who is in office seriously interferes with the working of our governmental machinery during the last two years of his term; and just about the time he gets to the point of highest efficiency people in the Senate and in the House begin to figure to try to beat him. You can not separate the attempt to beat an individual from the attempt to make ineffective the operations of the Government which that individual is carrying on in accordance with his duty. Legislation in this Congress has been largely dominated for two years past by considerations of that sort; and I should like to see those considerations exiled from these Halls.

The work of the executive departments is affected by a situation of this kind. The heads of bureaus, and the heads of divisions, and the clerks, and the subordinate officers begin toward the end of a term to turn their attention to the question of election or reelection, and their efficiency is greatly decreased.

I think we would have a more effective Government if we exiled from the considerations operating upon both legislation and administration any idea of reelection of the President. It is for that reason that I have felt very favorably inclined toward this amendment.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have already discussed this question at considerable length, and I am not disposed to take up the time of the Senate in further discussion. But I do want to say, in view of some remarks that have been made on the floor this morning, that at the time I introduced this resolution I disavowed any intention of favoring any man or any candidate for office. Therefore I thoroughly appreciate the views on that subject of the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from New York. I should like to have every personal interest eliminated from this controversy. It is a great fundamental question that we are dealing with here. It ought not to be complicated in any way by the interest any individual may have in the result of the votes that may be taken upon it.

Therefore I am very much in sympathy with the proposition to have this resolution take effect at the expiration of the next term of the President of the United States, so that all questions of its affecting candidates or persons who have already been elected may be eliminated from the controversy.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, may I inquire what the pending amendment is?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment is the amendment submitted by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to strike out "six" and insert "four."

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to state that at the proper time I shall offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and I ask to have it read and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read, and will be printed.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following as a separate paragraph after line 10, on page 2:

The Congress shall have power to provide for the recall of the President by a popular vote at any biennial election.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before the yeas and nays are taken I want to make a statement in explanation of the vote which I shall cast upon the amendment. I understand that it proposes to strike out "six years" and substitute "four years."

I shall vote for the amendment, with a view of perfecting the resolution and making it better, though I shall afterwards offer a substitute for it as amended. My reason is that I think six years is too long to have a bad President in the White House, if we ever should have one. I think four years fits in better with all the balance of our system. It fits in better with the terms of Members of the House. It fits in better with everything. I am of the opinion that Mr. Jefferson once uttered that the present practice, which is practically a term of eight years with the opportunity of recall in the middle of the term, is better than either of the others. But I think the argument made by the Senator from Massachusetts is sound, and it would apply not only to a six-year but to a seven-year term. You are emphasizing rather than diminishing the defect of our system as it is, and that defect consists in the fact that now and then you have a legislature and an Executive out of sympathy with one another; and to perpetuate the period during which they may be out of sympathy with one another is to perpetuate lame and impotent and unsatisfactory government.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 in the proposed amendment of the committee, on line 6, before the word "years," it is proposed to strike out "six" and insert "four," so that if amended the clause will read:

The term of the office of President shall be four years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. This is a rather important matter, and we should have a quorum in the Chamber when it is passed upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dixon	McCumber	Sanders
Bankhead	du Pont	McLean	Shively
Bourne	Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Simmons
Bradley	Gamble	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Gardner	O'Gorman	Smith, Ga.
Bristow	Gronna	Oliver	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Guggenheim	Overman	Smoot
Burnham	Hitchcock	Owen	Stephenson
Burton	Jackson	Page	Sutherland
Catron	Johnson, Me.	Paynter	Swanson
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Percy	Thomas
Clapp	Jones	Perkins	Thornton
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Perky	Townsend
Cullom	Kern	Pomerene	Wetmore
Cummins	Lippitt	Richardson	Williams
Dillingham	Lodge	Root	Works

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER] on account of illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is necessarily absent from the city. I desire this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

Mr. KERN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] on account of illness.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In addition to my statement in reference to the absence of the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], I desire to state that he is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll 64 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

The question is upon the motion submitted by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, in the proposed amendment of the committee, line 6, before the word "years," it is proposed to strike out "six" and insert "four"; so that, if amended, that portion of the amendment will read:

The term of the office of President shall be four years.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to the amendment of the committee.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MASSEY]. I desire this announcement to stand for the day. I vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], and I vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. As he is not present in the Chamber, I will withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GARDNER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE], and I withhold my vote.

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. In his absence, I will withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. RICHARDSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence, I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Has the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a pair with that Senator. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. Not being satisfied in my mind as to how he would vote on this particular amendment, I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS].

Mr. THORNTON. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER].

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—25.

Ashurst	Clapp	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Dixon	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Smoot

So Mr. BACON's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to have the amendment I just offered now read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas submits an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. After line 10, on page 2, insert:

The Congress shall have power to provide for the recall of the President by a popular vote at any biennial election.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I am very much opposed to this amendment to the Constitution, because I believe that the four years is a long enough term for the President before the people shall have an opportunity to pass judgment on his administration. I think the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] this morning presented very clearly one of the weaknesses of our system of government. It not infrequently occurs that the President is out of harmony with the Congress politically, and the result is that important legislation is held up until the country has had an opportunity to pass upon the issues involved in the controversy.

When a President has had two years and his administration is not satisfactory to the American people, they usually elect a Congress of political views different from those of the President. The purpose of the people is to express dissent from the administration in power. In my opinion that should mean a reversal in the policy of the Government, but under our system it can not result in a reversal in the policy of government; it only means a suspension of the functions of government to a certain extent; that is, the laws or the policies which the President stands for and which the people have disapproved can not be changed, because he has the power to stop the legislation. We have had an experience now of two years in which the Congress differs with the President upon the questions of tariff. The country has passed upon the tariff policy of the present administration adversely to the President, but the President, being in power for four years, has for two years prevented the will of the people, as expressed in the congressional elections, from being enacted into law. This has happened time and again in the history of our country.

So I think it would be dangerous and highly unsatisfactory if the President should have the power to suspend action for four years instead of two, which would be the case in the event that a constitutional amendment of this kind should be adopted.

If there is anything in the theory of our Government that it is a government which rests upon the will of the governed, then there ought to be means by which the will of the governed can become manifest and effective.

Instead of making the Government more flexible and more responsive to public will this constitutional amendment proposes to make it less flexible and more irresponsive to the public will. The argument that is made here on the floor in behalf of the amendment is that it relieves the President from any responsibility to the people for his administrative acts. It is proposed to intrench him in office beyond their reach, regardless of the character of his administration.

The Senator from Massachusetts never expressed a more potent truth than when he said that if the people want to reelect a man perpetually and establish a dictatorship paper constitutions will not prevent them from doing it. This is a step in the direction of preventing public opinion from exercising its will in an orderly way in the government of the United States.

One of the amazing things in connection with this controversy is that it seems to have the support of the Democratic Party. I have always understood that the Democratic Party believed in popular government; that it claimed to believe in the wisdom of the people. Yet we have here the contradictory proposition of the Democratic Party as a party supporting a proposition to take from the people the power to reelect a man if they think he has made a good public servant. It refuses to permit them to pass judgment upon the character of his administration. This proposition is based upon the theory that the President should be independent of the people.

This amendment is contrary to the trend of modern thought, to the political movement of modern times, because the evolution of our Government has been to give the people more power and not take from them powers which they now have.

It is said that the President during the last years of his administration may become a poor President, because he seeks to popularize himself with the people for the purpose of securing a reelection; that it is a bad thing for the President to seek to please the people who chose him to govern them, and therefore we will take from them the right to reelect a man because he has pleased them; and we will take from the President the incentive to respond to the popular will in his administration. That is what this means, and that is the very theory upon which it is being pressed.

I believe that the American people are perfectly capable of selecting their Presidents. I have not any less faith in the intelligence of the American people to-day than had our fathers when the Constitution was adopted. They did not believe that it was unsafe to permit the American people to have the opportunity of reelecting their President. They believed that the American people at that time could be trusted, that they had sufficient intelligence and information to act wisely. I do not believe it has ever been claimed that they were not patriotic. The allegation has never been made that the American people did not love their country and did not want to exercise the functions of the Government which they had the privilege of exercising in harmony with what would be for the best interests of the country.

But it has been alleged that the public itself has not the information, has not the intelligence, to judge wisely in regard to laws or governmental policies. But it has remained for this day for any considerable coterie of statesmen to question their wisdom in selecting their Presidents. If 130 years ago leading statesmen of our country believed that then it was perfectly safe to permit the people to have the opportunity of reelecting a President if they saw fit, is it not just as safe now? When the Constitution was adopted there was but two daily papers in the United States and neither of them had a circulation of fifteen hundred. Now, there are thousands of them, many of which have circulations aggregating hundreds of thousands.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Kansas thinks that because our forefathers decided, after prolonged debate, to make no prohibition against the reelection of the President, therefore we in this day, after our experience of more than 100 years, should take their judgment. I ask him in reply, if that assumption or conclusion is correct, would it not also be true that we should take the judgment which they then rendered upon the election of United States Senators instead of now making up our minds to change the arrangement as they then made it and make those Senators elected directly by the people instead of by the legislatures, as our forefathers designed?

Mr. BRISTOW. The premise of the Senator from Nebraska is not correct. I did not say that because our forefathers thought it would be safe for the people to be trusted with the power to reelect therefore we ought to be able to trust them. I did say, in substance, that if they believed, with the facilities for popular information which then existed, it was safe to trust the American people, certainly with the enlarged opportunities for public information, with the increased capacity of the American people to judge upon public questions, it does not become us now to take from the people an authority which our fathers thought they at that time were capable of wisely and safely exercising. If the argument was sound then it is a thousandfold sounder now.

I will say further to the Senator from Nebraska that even if our fathers, when the Constitution was adopted, had forbidden the American people by its provisions to reelect a President, I would now be in favor of taking out of the Constitution that restriction.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am very glad to hear the Senator say that, because it seems to me that the argument he made was without very good foundation, and he practically abandons it now when he says that he does not believe in taking their judgment in the light of recent experience.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken, or he did not understand me. I am afraid that he has not been listening with his usual attention. I have not abandoned any argument or any position that I took. I am simply emphasizing the position which I took and trying to call to the attention of the Senate the reasons why the people should now or could now more safely be trusted with this authority than they could 130 years ago. If it was safe then, as our fathers believed, and experience has demonstrated they were right, why is it necessary now to take from the people this right which they have enjoyed for that time and which every Senator in this Chamber must admit they have exercised wisely, because there is not a Senator who will rise from his seat and declare that this power has been abused by the American people in the past. They have not reelected a President who has abused the power of the Presidency, but the uniform experience of the American people in the administration of their Government has been that whenever a President was not a good President he is removed at the end of four years by selecting his successor. It is an amazing proposition to me that this amendment can command the support that it now does, and, regardless of the amendments submitted here to-day, which doubtless will be incorporated in the joint resolution before it is acted upon, I believe the motive that prompts many of the advocates of this constitutional amendment—I do not say all, for I know it is not true as to all—is to keep the Presidency open so that this great honor may be passed around to gratify ambitious statesmen instead of being used to serve the best interests of a nation of 90,000,000 people.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] referred to some of the Presidents who had been reelected, indicating that it would not have been in the public interest to have changed the national administration at certain critical periods in the history of our country. There has never been, in my judgment, a great President who has not been reelected. I do not believe that the American people have ever refused to reelect a great President who had served them wisely. They have never elected a man for the third time, and possibly the action of Washington in refusing a third election, basing it upon the ground he did, has had a tremendous influence in preventing the election of any man for the third time.

But nevertheless, in my judgment, that has only been a factor, because in the development of our political institutions it has not been customary, and it has not been the habit of the American people, to continue any administration, personal or partisan, for a long period of time. The Republican Party, I believe, will have had continuous control of the Government of the United States for 16 years on the 4th day of next March, and, if I remember accurately, that is the longest period when the administration of the Government has ever been intrusted in the hands of any one party. Parties in power gradually become arbitrary and seem to lose touch, to use a common phrase, with the rank and file of the population. When they do so they are retired and their opponents are placed in charge of the Government. If the opponents do not exercise that power or that responsibility in harmony with public opinion the opponents are soon retired, and the defeat serves as a warning, as an instruction, as a discipline to the party that had theretofore controlled the Government. So the very operations of this Government of ours have been such, judging from the experience of the past, as to make the limitation proposed wholly unnecessary.

There is not a Senator here who will point to any period in the history of his country and cite it as an example that justifies this change in our Constitution. The experience of 130 years has demonstrated that this power has never been used except wisely by the American people. Then why is it to be taken from them? Ah, my friends, I wish——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Kansas will permit an interruption, I wish to ask does the Senator understand this joint resolution as taking any power from the American people?

Mr. BRISTOW. I certainly do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I had, then, a misapprehension. I thought that the joint resolution was to submit the question to the people whether or not they should take certain powers from themselves.

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, yes; I understand. That has been referred to once before here this morning by a Senator in discussing the question, but Senators do not vote upon these constitutional amendments simply for the purpose of submitting them. Heretofore, at least, such an amendment has reflected the judgment of the Senators who voted upon it. We have not submitted amendments as they come along and passed them on to the people; that has not been the practice of the United States Senate or of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, my question was not directed to that. I did not say that any Senator voting for the amendment would not also be willing, as one of the people, to vote to circumscribe his power as one of the people that far; but the Senator has been arguing for about 10 minutes upon the line that we are depriving the American people of an opportunity, of a liberty, and of a power, when really what we are proposing to do is to submit to them a joint resolution which, so far from depriving them of any power, gives them a power to deprive themselves of a power, and which requires a vote of three-fourths of all the States in the Union voting by a majority of the people before it can become effective.

Mr. BRISTOW. I shall be very glad if the Senator from Mississippi will take that same view of his responsibility in submitting an amendment when some amendments which are now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary come before the Senate for action.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I beg the Senator's pardon once more. The Senator seems still to misunderstand me. It is the duty of a Senator to reflect his own opinion as a citizen in the vote which he casts upon a proposed amendment to the Constitution. But that is not the question. The Senator is making a speech to go to the world for the purpose of influencing public opinion, and he seems to be trying to make the impression upon the people that we are depriving them of an opportunity or of a power, whereas the truth is that those of us who think that we are willing to circumscribe our power as a part of the people to this extent are submitting it to the remainder of the people to see if they are willing to do so.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am making a few remarks for the purpose of impressing the country with the fact that a large number of the membership of the United States Senate believe there should be taken from the people the power to reelect a President even if he has been a satisfactory one, for the passing of this joint resolution can mean nothing else.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the fact that when this joint resolution is submitted to the people, it is not submitted to the people, but is submitted to the delegates of the people, much smaller in number, who may be more easily influenced in the matter than the people, and the people do not in reality pass upon the joint resolution. I think the Senator from Kansas is entirely right in demanding the right of recall on any man who is put in the presidential chair.

Mr. BRISTOW. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. DIXON. I merely want to supplement what the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has said. As a matter of fact, the people of the United States will never have any opportunity to pass on these matters. With the 48 States, averaging probably 125 members of the legislature to a State, it is within the power of less than 6,000 people by the membership of those legislatures to effectually and perpetually tie the hands of the American people in this matter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas will pardon me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In reply to the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON], I will say that his remarks rest upon an assumption which I do not believe has any foundation in fact, and that is that when the legislatures of three-fourths of the States of the American Union vote in a certain way they do not reflect the opinion of the American people; that his assumption is an assumption which takes it for granted that representative government is a broken reed; that it is an obsolete, useless, and ridiculous institution; that the representatives of the people in the States do not represent the people who make them representatives. That now and then there should be a Judas Iscariot amongst the Twelve Apostles goes without saying; that there should now and then be representatives of the people who misrepresent the people goes equally without saying; but I, for one, get a little tired of the assumption, generally made oracularly, that when the representatives of the people act in the name of the people and for the people, exercising the functions which the people have intrusted to them, the people have neither part nor parcel in their action.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator from Kansas permit me to make a suggestion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] evidently overlooks the fact that in every other constitutional amendment submitted by Congress to the legislatures of the different States such submission has been for the purpose of enlarging the power of the people themselves. This is the only constitutional amendment proposed to be submitted that has for its purpose the curtailment of the power of the people.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is a totally different question; that is going to the merits of the proposition.

Mr. DIXON. The amendment rests on an entirely different basis from that of any other constitutional amendment heretofore submitted. It tends to curtail the power of the people, while every other constitutional amendment has had for its purpose the enlargement of the power of the people themselves.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not care to reply to that, because that is going to the merits of the proposition, and I do not think it is fair to take up the time of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] for that purpose. That goes to the main argument and is a total deflection from the point I was making, which was that the Senator from Kansas was making an appeal to the people that they were being sacrificed and deprived of something by us, whereas as a matter of fact, it will rest with them as to whether it shall be consummated or not.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. OWEN. I merely want to suggest that representative government has so far failed in the United States that the people from one end of this Nation to the other have risen in rebellion against it, and from the Pacific coast to Maine have demanded the right to again take into their owns hands, when necessary, the direct power to govern.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator from Oklahoma——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I do not agree with the Senator from Oklahoma that representative government has failed. It has not failed. Because a representative now and then has proven incompetent it can not be said that representative government has failed. But if it has failed this is not the remedy for it. We are now proceeding contrary to the doctrine which the Senator from Oklahoma urges, and not in harmony with it, when we undertake to take away from the people the right to select whom they would for their Chief Magistrate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] think that the present restrictions in the Constitution should be eliminated and that the people should be given the unrestricted right to select whom they please for President? We have, for instance, a restriction that a man not a native of the United States shall not be President and that a man below a certain age shall not be President. We have similar limitations which apply to Senators. Does the Senator from Idaho take the position that no restriction should be applied to the office of President of the United States?

Mr. BORAH. I will answer that question by asking the Senator from Nebraska a question. Does the Senator from Nebraska think, if those restrictions were taken off, there would be any danger from leaving it to the people to select whom they would to represent them in the Senate? I accept the doctrine of representative government in all its logical conclusions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not think it is a question of providing against a danger. I think we are here to endeavor to so amend the Constitution of the United States as to improve the conditions surrounding the exercise of Executive power. We had a spectacle here only a few months ago of the office of the President of the United States being prostituted for the purpose of making a disgraceful campaign. That would not have been possible if this prohibition had been part of the Constitution. We saw the President of the United States leave the White House and go out upon a campaign of competitive personal vilification. We have seen over and over again months of the time of the President taken up in the effort to secure his reelection and in preparing for it, and I think it is a very wise thing to place a limitation upon the people of the United States and to make it impossible for the President of the United States to do such things.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Senator from Nebraska think that the people are perfectly capable of passing judgment upon the propriety of conduct of a candidate for the Presidency, whether he is in the White House or whether he is simply trying to get into the White House?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That might possibly be so if the matter could be submitted simply to a vote of the American people, but we all know that great machinery has got to be placed in motion. We saw a President of the United States renominate himself. The Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Idaho both know that the President secured his nomination by the use of presidential power, and that he might have been reelected had it not been for the unusual revolutionary course pursued in wrecking the Republican Party.

Mr. BORAH. I am sure the Senator from Nebraska thinks that, when the matter got to the people, the people took care of it pretty well.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think they took care of it admirably.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. Why not leave it to them at all times?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But, nevertheless, the closing months of the term of the President of the United States were disgraced—and I am not criticizing the President for what he did; possibly he was forced into the action which he took by the attacks made upon him—but the fact was that the whole country was ashamed of the spectacle presented, and the whole country realized that the presidential power was being used. It is to prevent the use of such presidential power that this constitutional amendment is proposed.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. WORKS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I had the honor—I will not say the pleasure—of being in attendance on both the convention of four years ago and of the one held last summer; and I could not discover any perceptible difference between the effect of the influence which was exerted upon the convention in 1908 by the gentleman who was nominating his successor and that exerted in 1912 by the gentleman who was nominating himself. It might have been done in a different way, but the exertion bore the same fruit in each instance.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will not undertake to explain what difference there might have been. I do not know that there was any; but I think the President of the United States ought to be removed from political struggles.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is no possible way to remove the President of the United States from political struggles if he is a man at all fit to be in the presidential chair. If he is a man fit to be there, he will be a political leader and will direct the political forces of his party. If he is interested in anything in the world, except his own individual aggrandizement, he will undertake to direct the forces of his party whether he is retiring from the Presidency or whether he is coming into the Presidency. We have never had a great President who was not a political leader. We never will have a great President who is not a political leader in this Republic. He is the head of his party and will seek to lead his party, if not for his cause, then to the advantage of his successor.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say to the Senator that the time will never come when the presidential office will be divorced from politics so long as the occupant of the office has, or thinks he has, the opportunity of reelecting himself; but I want to say to the Senator that when the American people adopt this proposed constitutional amendment, as I believe they will adopt it, it will do more to remove the great office of President from the disgraceful contentions for reelection than anything else that can be done.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, just a word. To my way of thinking there was never a more aggressive campaign from the White House than that which was waged by Mr. Jefferson for the selection of his successor or that which was waged by Gen. Jackson for the selection of his successor or that which was waged by Col. Roosevelt for the selection of his successor. They were party leaders; the party looked to them and reposed confidence in them; they molded public opinion; they believed in the principles of their party; they believed that it was necessary in order to serve the country that the principles of their party should prevail, and therefore they exerted their influence, as I say every true leader of his party will do, whether he is coming into office or going out of office.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Ah, but the Senator realizes that there is a vast space of time between the days of Jefferson and the present day, and he knows that the methods employed and the weapons used in the days of President Jefferson were of far different character from the weapons used and the methods employed in the present day.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there is not a very long——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will permit an interruption——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of Senators to the fact that only one Senator can talk at the same time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I may not have heard all that the Senator from Idaho said, but if his reasoning was as defective as was his historical allusion it must have been very defective indeed. Mr. Jefferson exercised no part of his influence to nominate Mr. Madison. He exercised influence to keep his party in power, but he had two warm personal friends, Madison and Monroe, who were candidates for the nomination at the hands of the Democratic-Republican Party, and he declared that he would stand neutral between them.

Mr. BORAH, Mr. WORKS, and others addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Kansas yield? There are four Senators claiming the attention of the Chair, asking for recognition.

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and then I should like to resume.

Mr. BORAH. I hesitate to differ on a question of political history with the Senator from Mississippi, but I am quite sure that I am not in error when I say that Mr. Jefferson exerted influence to select his successor. I am perfectly willing to let my statement stand and be supported by the historic facts, notwithstanding the view entertained by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have made no statement of historic facts. The Senator from Idaho made a statement of historic facts——

Mr. BORAH. I was aware the Senator from Mississippi had not made any, but he undertook to——

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the statement of historic facts made by the Senator from Idaho rests upon no evidence which he can produce now or during this year or during this decade; and if he can I for one shall be very glad to see it. It rests upon a great many federalistic statements as to what Jefferson did, but there is not a word or there is not a fact that can be attributed to him that shows that he ever raised his hand as between those two men. He did, however, want one or the other nominated.

Mr. BORAH. And the one he wanted nominated succeeded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But privately he preferred Mr. Madison, and said so in a letter to Jack Eppes, his son-in-law.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Mississippi will proceed in a few moments to support my contention. He has already said that which is precisely true, that while Mr. Jefferson let it be understood that he would not exert any effort as between the two men, he never hesitated to let his private friends know what he desired to have, and he got it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course I am not trying to answer the Senator's argument. I am merely trying to keep history straight.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Mississippi is too shrewd an observer and student not to know the historical facts to which I have referred. Mr. Jefferson quietly but effectively and persistently let his friends know his preference for Madison.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. WORKS. It is said everything comes to him who waits——

Mr. BRISTOW. I hope that my time will come bye and bye. [Laughter.]

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has said that the people admirably took care of the situation resulting from the kind of campaign he has discussed. I am afraid he thinks so because the people elected a Democratic President; but I should like to ask him whether he thinks the subsequent action of the people wiped out the disgrace to this country resulting from the kind of campaign that took place before the nominations?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I certainly entirely agree with the Senator from California on that point. I merely felt compelled to answer as I did the categorical question of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

While I am on my feet, I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho this question: Has there not been a vast change in the methods which were used in a dignified way by Thomas Jefferson to express his ideas and his convictions and to give his reasons for desiring a particular successor or a particular party to succeed, and the present-day methods of turning over the whole machinery of executive power to a campaign to control a convention? Can the Senator not see the tremendous change that has developed and the need for a remedy for this new evil?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I am not criticizing the methods of Mr. Jefferson in selecting his successor. They were consummate and perfect for his day. He used all the influence necessary to accomplish his purpose. I do not say that he used corrupt methods or means. Of course, I do not know that he did; and, if I did know it, I would conceal it for the sake of our Democratic friends, who are just now coming into power. [Laughter.]

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield further?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho, in all candor, if it is not very generally suspected at the present time, and if there is not strong circumstantial evidence to warrant the belief, that the motive which impelled Theodore Roosevelt to force a certain successor upon the convention at Chicago in 1908 was that he had ultimately in view the reappearance of Theodore Roosevelt as a candidate for President four years later? Is it not suspected and believed that the motive which the President had at that time, in 1908, was really one of self-interest?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator from Nebraska does not entertain that view. So I will say, in my opinion, that view is simply the fumes of a diseased mind.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am very glad to have the Senator from Idaho give me a clean bill of health [laughter], but I am not able to permit myself to admit that there is no ground for that belief. I have heard from certain sources that I think reliable that Theodore Roosevelt was immensely surprised when he learned that William H. Taft was to be a candidate for renomination.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, there have been one or two suggestions made during the last half hour of miscellaneous controversy that I should like to give a little attention to, and then I will finish the remarks that I was making.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] referred to divorcing the Presidency from politics. I think the Senator, after reflection, will see how ridiculous a proposition of that kind is. The Presidency is a political position, the highest within the gift of the American people, and the business of the President is to administer the political affairs of his country as the Chief Executive. We hear a good deal of cheap talk—I do not refer, of course, to any talk in the Senate—about divorcing this and that from politics. There is no more honorable calling among men, if you will except the holy calling of the ministry, than the calling of the politician, if he understands the dignity and the responsibility that go with the administration of the political affairs of his country. It is true that there are cheap grafters who occasionally inject themselves into political affairs and fail to appreciate the high purpose which ought to animate men who are engaged in administering the politics of the country, and such men merit the condemnation of all; but it is as utterly impossible to divest the Presidency of the United States from politics as it would be to divest the ministry from religion. It is the business of the President of the United States to administer political affairs as the executive head of the Government, and he should administer them wisely and in the public interest.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Kansas is absolutely accurate when he says that the Presidency is a political office and must always remain a political office, but I want him to recall his expression and see if he is willing to reaffirm the statement that it is the business of the President to administer the political affairs of the country. Is the Senator not willing to qualify that a little?

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, I may——

Mr. CUMMINS. Is there not a very great difference, in other words, between political offices? We are holding political offices here, but I hope the duties are quite different from those that are performed by the person who holds the political office of President of the United States.

Mr. BRISTOW. What I meant—I do not now remember whether I expressed myself with accuracy—was that the President exercised the political duties that were conferred upon the Chief Executive of the Nation. Those duties are political.

The Senator from California referred with some emotion to the disgraceful incidents which antedated the election last year, and the nomination as well. I can not conceive that it is the business of the American Congress to try to engraft common sense into men's minds by constitutional amendment. I do not care how many constitutional amendments you adopt, you can not make a man wise if he is not so by nature, nor can you prevent a man from disgracing his office if he is disposed to do it. I am not saying that any offices have been disgraced, for I do not agree with the Senator from California in his statement that political campaigns that may be in bad taste are disgraceful.

The only argument that is made in favor of this resolution is that it will prevent a President from becoming inefficient by endeavoring to please the people in order to renominate and reelect himself. If the effort of any man to please an intelligent constituency is against him and should disqualify him, then I am glad that I am not in harmony with that view, which is the view that seems to be expressed here in this debate by the advocates of this resolution.

I want to carry out a little further the view suggested by the Senator from Idaho in regard to the efforts made by a President to select his successor. I believe President Roosevelt was responsible for the nomination of Mr. Taft four years ago. He wanted Mr. Taft nominated because he believed Mr. Taft would carry out the policies of government to which Mr. Roosevelt's administration was devoted. With that purpose in view he used the powerful influence which he had with the American people in order to induce his party to nominate the man who he thought would prolong those policies four years longer. As the Senator from Idaho has said, any President who was worth his salt would undertake to do the same thing by all honorable means. If he believed that the policies of government for which his administration stood were wise and in the interest of his country, then he should undertake to influence in an honorable way the selection of a successor who would continue to carry out those policies.

This amendment will have no more influence than if it were not passed in preventing an administration from being active in politics to promulgate and promote its ideas. It simply changes the situation so that the President instead of undertaking to renominate himself—if you care to put it that way—will undertake to nominate his successor, as has been done by the great Presidents of the past, as the Senator from Idaho has very clearly and very accurately stated.

As to whether or not these efforts are disgraceful, unpatriotic, or unwise, depends upon the character of the man who is President. As I have said, you can not adopt constitutional amendments that will legislate or incorporate common sense into a man's head. And if a President does unwise or disgraceful things the people will pass a wise judgment upon his action.

Referring to the original interruption of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who criticized the position I took when I said that the resolution proposed to take from the people a power which they now have, and which they have had since the Constitution was adopted, and which they have exercised wisely, and concerning their exercise of which not a word of criticism has been heard, I desire to say that it must be conceded that a vote of the Senate upon a resolution submitting an amendment to the Constitution of the United States is equivalent to, and is, in fact, a recommendation from the Senate that that amendment be adopted by the people. If it were not, why should it require two-thirds of the membership of this body to submit the resolution? When the resolution goes before the people, it goes before the people with the sanction of two-thirds of the membership of this body, and no other construction can be put upon the action of the Senate.

So, I repeat, this is a proposition to take from the people authority which they have been exercising for approximately 130 years, which they have exercised with wisdom and discretion, from the exercise of which no harm has ever come to the country, and the lack of which authority would have been at times a calamity to this Government.

With that statement, which can not be successfully contradicted by any man upon this floor, I leave the question to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask a question for information. As I understand, the amendment proposed by him is to the effect that Congress may provide for a recall of the President at the end of a two-year period?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Suppose Congress so provides, and the people act, and the President is recalled, what then becomes of the Government?

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Congress is authorized to recall the President, it is certainly authorized to provide for the Government, after he is recalled, by letting the people select his successor. I can modify the amendment so as to provide for that if it is deemed necessary.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator's proposed amendment certainly does not cover that point. The Senator's amendment simply provides that Congress may provide for a recall of the President. Who shall then succeed to the presidential office, or how it shall be provided for, is left wholly in the air.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think it is left with Congress. I have not any doubt about it. Of course I am not a constitutional lawyer, but if I can construe the ordinary language that is used in the affairs of men, it seems to me that if Congress is given the authority to provide for the recall of the President, the recall in itself means that provision must be made for his successor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The provision to which this would be an amendment, if it were adopted, is that the term of office of the President shall be six years. If we add to that simply a provision that at the end of two years the President may be recalled, and say nothing more about it, it would seem to be self-evident that no provision exists by which the term could be filled for the remaining period.

Mr. BRISTOW. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Congress shall have power to provide for the recall of the President by a popular vote at any biennial election.

Mr. BRISTOW. In my opinion that gives full power to Congress to provide for the recall of the President and the selection of a successor by a popular vote, if the people see fit to do it. If it does not, I shall be glad to listen to a suggestion from the very able constitutional lawyer who sits by my side, the Senator from Utah, as to an amendment that will cover that point.

I think the people ought to have the right when they pronounce judgment adversely upon an administration to put another one in control of the Government that will carry out their will; and that is the purpose of this amendment to the resolution. I do not think their hands ought to be tied for six years, so that an Executive who happens to get in and who may refuse to serve the public interests can stay there in defiance of the people. I can not understand how men can think that is a wise way to administer the affairs of a government the sovereign power of which is the popular will.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It occurred to me, Mr. President, that it would simplify the process, and accomplish the manifest purpose of the Senator, if he would make the term of the President two years instead of six. Then, of course, he could be reelected if the people approved his administration, and there would be no necessity for a recall.

Mr. BRISTOW. No; no; I do not agree with the Senator. I think there are many men who would be elected President that would serve the full six years under this resolution, if it should ever pass, without meriting rebuke from the hands of the American people at the end of the first two years of their terms of service. The experience of our country has demonstrated that wise men are not only retained in office, that their administrations are not only supported in the congressional elections following the inauguration of their administrations, but that they are reelected, after having served four years, with Congresses in harmony with their views.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is the very question, Mr. President, if the Senator will yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator suggested, as one of the principal arguments in favor of the proposed amendment, the fact that at the end of two years of a presidential term the temper of the country might change, and it might elect a House of Representatives of political opinion different from that of the President, and therefore if the President could be recalled the Presidency could be placed in harmony with the House and with Congress. He instanced the present situation of Congress, which he described as being hostile to the tariff policy of the present President.

If the country should change its opinion as to the party in power and should elect a House of Representatives hostile to the President, on the Senator's own statement of the case and in conformity with his own argument would it not be wise to have the President elected each two years, just as Members of the House of Representatives are elected?

Mr. BRISTOW. No; I do not think so; and I want to take issue with the statement which the Senator from Connecticut made when he began. He said "if the temper of the country should change." I do not think the temper of the country changes quickly on public questions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am inclined to differ from the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the President changes, if he does not carry out the policies for which he stood, and the people are disappointed in him because he has not done so, they ought to have the right then to recall him, because he has failed to carry out the will and purpose of the people who elected him. I do not think the temper of the country changed on the tariff between 1908 and 1910. I think the temper of the country in 1908 and in 1910 was exactly the same. It elected a Democratic Congress in 1910 not because it was in favor of any Democratic policy on the tariff, because that was a vague and uncertain proposition, but because it was the only way it had of expressing its disapproval of the administration bill, the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. If there had been any other way of correcting that legislative mistake, in my judgment there would not have been a change such as we have now.

This amendment to the resolution seeks to make more responsive to public opinion our executive administration. The Senator from Massachusetts and I disagree on almost everything. I think this is the first time for many months that we have met on common ground on any political question. We do it in this case from entirely different points of view. He has called attention to the fact that the English Government is more responsive to the will of the people than is our Government, because there is greater authority in the Parliament of England than there is in the Congress of the United States. The administration of the laws of England rests with a ministry whose existence does not depend upon the will of a president or a king, but upon the will of the Parliament; and when public opinion makes itself felt with the Parliament, the ministry must be in harmony with the Parliament or go out of power.

Our Government is such that the executive administration of the laws may be out of harmony with the legislative branch of the Government, and it results in a blockade of legislation for two years. While the adoption of this amendment to the resolution probably would not be the most desirable way to correct this unfortunate condition that frequently confronts us, it certainly would be better than to perpetuate a blockade of this kind for four years instead of two, as it now is. This resolution enlarges the present obstruction.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it seems to me this resolution is a striking example of an effort to accomplish a certain definite and very well-understood purpose, in the serious matter of changing the Constitution of the United States, which will have an effect the opposite of that which is intended.

One of the objects of this resolution is to improve the administration of the office of President by removing the inducement offered by the ambition of the President to succeed himself—to occupy his time in securing a reelection—and thereby to induce him to devote himself to the performance of the duties and functions of his office.

Another purpose of the advocates of this resolution is, I suppose—to judge from the conversation and the speeches we heard in the recent campaign—to save the country from a Napolean or a Cæsar who might use the power and patronage of the administration to perpetuate himself indefinitely in office.

I think it is clearly demonstrable that, if this resolution should be adopted, it would have the opposite effect in both particulars. It was not once or twice but many times that this question was debated when the Constitution was framed and when the term of office of the President was fixed. The first and the only Federal constitutional convention which ever sat in this country devoted a great amount of time to the question whether or not the President should be ineligible for reelection.

It is perfectly true, as the Senator from Kansas has said, that while all the reasons still exist that existed then for retaining the President's eligibility for reelection, many of the objections have disappeared, and there are now a great many additional reasons which did not exist at that time in favor of preserving in the people the power, if they see fit, perhaps in some great emergency of the Government or of the country, to retain at the head of the executive branch of the Government, it may be, the only man who is available to deal with the problems of the hour.

One of the strong reasons that was urged in the Federal convention against the proposition to make the President ineligible for reelection was that it would remove the incentive to meet the approval of the people whom he was serving which would come from an honorable reelection to the office which he held. That argument had great weight with the convention in determining against the same proposition which is put forward here.

The term of six years for President is entirely too long for a bad man, and it is too short for a good man. The remedy for the abuse of the powers of the Presidency and for the misuse of patronage is certainly not by taking away from the people a portion of the power which they now have for the control of that office, but rather by increasing it.

The proposition involves the whole broad question of the relations of the people to the Government, to what extent the people are to be able to control the Government, and how much power the Federal Government shall have. This proposition is to limit the power of the Federal Government by limiting the term of the Chief Executive. The question of the control of private monopoly, of whether or not the Federal Government is to have sufficient power to deal with interstate monopoly, of the relations of State governments to the Federal Government, whether these questions are to be left to the States, or whether the Federal Government is to be supported and upheld in the efforts which the advocates of Federal control are making, are all involved in this proposition.

Mr. President, if the Government were an alien Government or in control of an alien power, the proposition on the part of the advocates of government by the people to limit its power would be perfectly logical. But the Government is not an alien government; it is not such a government as existed in England, when the models upon which this Government was framed were developed, where the source of government was derived from some place outside of the people, when the King repudiated the doctrine that he got his power from the people, when the barons had another power, and when there was constant political warfare between these separate and distinct estates. The people, represented by the Commons, the barons, and the King, each claimed prerogatives independent of the other.

I think it is generally conceded in this country that the powers of government find their origin in the people, that all just government depends upon the consent of the governed. We are confronted constantly with the problem whether the Government is to be more independent of the people, more removed from their control, less responsive, or whether, on the other hand, the people are to be given a wider and more direct control over its various departments.

I admit that so far as the use of the power of the Presidency, including the disposition of patronage and appointment to office is concerned, if our political system of party government and party organization and conventions were to continue as they have existed in the past, there is a very great opportunity for perpetuating the Presidency in the hands of the incumbent by the use of the power and patronage of the office.

But that is utterly impossible. It has been demonstrated by recent political history in this country under the system of primaries which is now finding favor, and which has been put in force in a large number of States, that where the people have the real power to select the President, the abuses of presidential power, the misuse of presidential patronage, are perfectly futile and worse than futile, in an effort to perpetuate the incumbent in office.

The last campaign for the nomination of the Republican candidate has been pointed out here and it has been justly stigmatized. In that campaign every opportunity of office was taken advantage of. Every use that could be made of patronage or presidential power was set in motion to secure the nomination. And yet, in every State in the Union where the people had an opportunity to take a real part in the nomination, that misuse and abuse of power and patronage was condemned and repudiated, and their choice given by an overwhelming verdict of public opinion to another man, who was a private citizen and had no opportunity to bring to bear appointments to office and presidential favors in order to get delegates in the convention. So, when the system of primary nominations prevails, whenever it shall be generally adopted in this country, by which the people will really have an opportunity to control the nominations for the Presidency, it will be utterly impossible for the nomination to be controlled by a President, however long he may be in his office; and when that becomes evident, as it must become evident, as is already demonstrated, the attempt of the incumbent to secure the nomination by such abuses which are sought to be avoided and prevented by this resolution will be voluntarily abandoned.

Mr. President, the question involved in this resolution of the degree of responsiveness of the Federal Government to the popular will and its power and responsibility when it has been chosen is a very live question before the American people today. There is being agitated throughout the country a proposition for calling a constitutional convention, and it is based upon the proposition that the conditions which have grown up largely in the last 20 years have far more, even, than the Civil War united the country into one Nation and have developed and emphasized the necessity of one central Government, with ample power to deal with abuses which reach from one border of the Nation to the other. I say that question is directly involved in this resolution as it affects the executive branch of the Government.

A few years ago the verdict of the American people was taken as to whether or not there should be an income tax. It was debated for years. The American people in a regular election voted in favor of an income tax. It was taken up in Congress, but the Congress which met after the election was not the one which had been chosen in the election. Under a hold-over system the legislative branch was not immediately responsible to the public will, and when in the course of a year the new Congress which had been chosen came into power and this question, which had been decided in the election, was presented to them the people were confronted by the obstacle of a large portion of the legislative branch holding over from previous elections. But finally, after a long course of agitation, the verdict of the people found response in an act of Congress, and it went before a third department of the Government and was argued by the attorneys for the people and the attorneys for the great private interests that were opposed to that measure.

There had been decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, a number of them, five of them, that such a law was constitutional. The Supreme Court heard the argument. They voted upon it and were evenly divided. One judge was absent. A rehearing was had. The absent judge took his seat upon the bench, and, of course, if his decision should be in favor of the income tax it would be established by the verdict of the Supreme Court as constitutional. He did decide in favor of it, but one of the other judges had reversed his previous decision in the case, having changed his mind overnight, and the long campaign for a just system of taxation by which the greater part of the wealth of the country, intangible personal assets, which largely escape, in my judgment, the assessor, ended in nothing, because the Government was not responsive to public opinion. As has been said here, it is less responsive than the Government of England or any other government under a modern constitution in Europe.

Now, instead of meeting these difficulties by making the Government more responsive to the people and by increasing its power, it is proposed to limit it and at the same time to further restrict the control of the people over it.

I do not know, Mr. President, how the myth arose that Washington ever—in his farewell address or at any other time—gave the great weight of his almost infallible judgment in favor of the proposition that a President should not hold more than two terms, that the tenure of the office should be limited either by custom or by law. I have read his farewell address, and it seems to me if it means anything it means that Washington was seeking to excuse himself before the American people because of his desire to retire to the enjoyment of private life, and was asking their indulgence to relieve him from what might seem to them to be his duty to continue in office for a longer period than for two terms. I want to read, because it is very brief, what he says on this point. He says:

> I beg you at the same time to do me the justice to be assured that this resolution has not been taken without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that in withdrawing the tender of service, which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest, no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness, but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.
> The acceptance of and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this previous to the last election had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence impelled me to abandon the idea. I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety, and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

It was an argument that there was no crisis in the affairs of the country at that time which demanded his continuance in office. It was an implication that if there had been such a crisis it would not only have been proper for the American people, should they see fit to do so, to continue him in office as President for more than two terms, but that it would have been the duty of the incumbent if called upon by the people to serve in that capacity. There is not anything that can be deduced from this expression to indicate that Washington either intended to establish a two-term custom or that he favored the doctrine of ineligibility.

But there is more than that in an epitome of all that can be said against this proposition written by Washington upon the identical subject, and if the Senate will indulge me for reading a portion of a page, I will do so. He says in a letter to Lafayette:

> There are other points in which opinions would be more likely to vary. As, for instance, on the ineligibility of the same person for President after he should have served a certain course of years. Guarded so effectually as the proposed Constitution is in respect to the prevention of bribery and undue influence in the choice of President, I confess I differ widely myself from Mr. Jefferson and you as to the expediency or necessity of rotation in that appointment. The matter was fairly discussed in the convention, and to my full conviction, though I can not have time or room to sum up the arguments in this letter. There can not, in my judgment, be the least danger that the President will by any practicable intrigue ever be able to continue himself one moment in office, much less to perpetuate himself in it, but in the last stage of corrupted morals and political depravity, and even then there is as much danger that any other species of domination would prevail. Though when a people shall have become incapable of governing themselves and fit for a master it is of little consequence from what quarter he comes. Under an extended view of this part of the subject, I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the services of any man who on some great emergency shall be deemed universally most capable of serving the public.

Now, if there is a danger of a man subverting the Constitution by the power of office, the very inclusion in the instrument of a prohibition against serving more than one term of six years will be the greatest incentive that can be offered to such a man.

Suppose a man of that caliber occupied the office who had met, perhaps, with the favor of the people, and was willing to use, as it was assumed in making this argument, an ambitious President would be willing to use the powers which come to him as President to subvert the spirit of the Government and its laws, and he should be confronted by a provision, a written attempt, a paper barrier, against perpetuating himself in office, there would be the greatest temptation that could be offered to him to violate the Constitution, to suspend this provision, to make some declaration by which to take advantage of his popularity with the people and his power as President, and ignore the amendment which is proposed here.

There are a great many free constitutions where there is not any freedom. There are a great many countries, small and large, where provisions of this kind are constantly violated. The hope of the country does not depend upon the Constitution as it is framed now, nor as it is to be amended, but it depends upon the capacity of the people to preserve peace and order and good government. The Constitution is no stronger than the political morals of the people who framed it and for whose government it was established. If you assume that a people can be corrupted by a President by the use of his office, so that he will be elected when he ought not to be, you have assumed that they are incapable of self-government and you have abandoned the whole case. You can not protect such a people by written constitutions. There can not be any form of free government which would be successful with such a people.

There are many things in our Constitution and in our extra-constitutional Government, a system of party government in the United States, which are practicable here, successful here, but which would be utterly impracticable in some other countries where the people are less educated, where they are less informed, where they possess less stability, less love of justice, less respect for the law.

I have heard a great many arguments made in the Senate against some of the proposed new agencies, which, after all, are nothing more than new ways of organizing political parties, and the Constitution does not deal with that at all. And yet they are opposed here as though they were undermining the very foundation of the Constitution. There is the primary, for instance. The primary nomination of candidates for office, the presidential preference primary, has nothing to do with the Constitution. It is a mere system of party government. I have heard many of the arguments made against those popular agencies which would be perfectly sound in the case of some constituencies, perhaps, in this country, and of the entire population of some other countries.

In considering whether or not the President shall hold office for six years and be ineligible for reelection, the whole question is as to whether or not the people are capable of determining that question for themselves, or whether you are going to attempt to put a guardian over them in the shape of a straight-jacket provision saying what they can not do in regard to electing a Chief Executive of the Nation.

If they were in their swaddling clothes such a provision would be necessary, but when they for a thousand years have exercised self-government and enjoyed freedom, when they have developed the greatest system of education, the most ample means for the transmission of information of any people in the world, it is an unusual time now, when we are in the midst of progress, when information and education are on the increase instead of on the wane, to introduce a proposition here to deprive them of some of their powers and pass a resolution which implies at least that we have suddenly awakened to the conclusion that the American people are politically decadent.

I imagine that every great private monopoly in the United States would hail with joy the passage of this joint resolution. I say "private monopoly" because the question of the regulation of those great private agencies underlies most of the political issues of to-day.

When a campaign to establish some principle of control or restraint of those who seek to use the power of wealth, the control of transportation, the undue advantage and special privilege of the tariff for the oppression of their weaker neighbors or the masses of the people—a power which must be restrained by the Government, because there is no other source from which the restraint can come—and it must be restrained by the Federal Government, because leaving it to the States is leaving it to be unrestrained. The States have not the requisite physical or political power, and many times they have not the disposition, when a campaign to put in the hands of the Federal Government means for this regulation and control is under way, and the question has been weighed before the people at the bar of public opinion—when they have rendered their judgment upon it in the election, and it has gone its course through all the checks and balances and divided powers of our system of government, and finally is having its effect in the hands of a vigorous and earnest administrator of the office of President—just as he is about to accomplish the results for which this long campaign has been waged he finds this amendment coming into play, should it be adopted, and saying that he must go out of power, and the hand of the man who has been found willing and able to meet the needs of the people upon this great question is palsied and their will rendered futile.

Every country furnishes examples, from which it is manifest that disaster would have fallen upon them if they had been governed in the great crises of their history by such a provision as this. Our own history is full of such instances. We have had times of stress, when the Nation's existence was at stake, when the conduct of a great war or the prosecution of a great policy depended upon a single individual who was the man fitted for the hour. Suppose that in the midst of his power, his official responsibility, his official opportunity, in the Civil War, for instance—because it may as well be as not that his six years' term would expire in the midst of a critical campaign, upon which the life of the Nation was at stake—this amendment should call him out of office, throwing the country into the throes of an election of a new and untried man. It is not logical; it is not common sense; it does not tend toward the freedom or liberty of the people or to enlarge in any way the safety or the service which the Government renders to them.

There is not a successful private organization in the world which would adopt such a policy, and one phase of the Government is but that of a great business organization. Every great private business concern has achieved its success to a large extent by the selection of competent men to do its work and by keeping them in their position and by promoting them to the highest positions so long as they remain faithful and competent.

The fathers of the Constitution were wise enough to fix a short term of office for the President, and to leave him eligible for reelection, because it gives the people an opportunity every four years to determine whether or not he is competent to administer the duties of that office. It is impossible for him to abuse the power of the office to any great extent within that short period, with the new agencies of nomination I have referred to, and yet it leaves with the people the privilege of continuing him there indefinitely, or at least past the danger period of some critical passage of the Nation, if they see fit to do so.

An occasion that everybody will bear in mind was when the Empire of Great Britain first extended itself in that mighty sweep around the world and established its flag and its laws from its island home to the end of the seven seas—when the Earl of Chatham was at the head of the English Government, when Clive was selected by him to lead the armies of England in India, when he sent Wolfe to face Montcalm in Canada, when he was waging a mighty struggle against the armies of France on the frontier of Germany—when the question was whether England should blossom and bloom and prosper and flourish as the greatest empire of modern times or whether it should sink into obscurity and insignificance as a defeated rival of its European neighbors. Suppose in that crisis in the history of Great Britain some foolish, some absolutely illogical provision of the constitution had decreed that the great Lord Chatham should give up the helm of state and step down and a new and untried and incompetent man should take his place. The same condition might well arise here—it will arise here if this amendment is adopted, the effects of which will come back to plague and curse the people for whose benefit it is supposed to be framed.

During the delivery of Mr. POINDEXTER's speech,

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me for a moment?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer a proposed substitute for the joint resolution, that it may be pending.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very glad to yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The Secretary will read the proposed substitute.

The Secretary read as follows:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of the President shall be four years. No person who has held the office by election, or discharged its powers or duties, or acted as President under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof, shall be eligible to hold the office by election more than one additional term.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thank the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator is entirely welcome.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator from Washington yield to me to offer an amendment, that it may be printed?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska for that purpose.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My amendment contemplates striking out the reference to the officer who may hold or exercise the power. I should like to have it read, so as to get it into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska proposes an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 7, in the committee amendment, after the word "election," strike out down to and including the word "thereof," in line 9, so as to read:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of President shall be six years, and no person who has held the office by election shall be eligible to hold again the office by election.

After the conclusion of Mr. POINDEXTER's speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like the yeas and nays on that, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I wish to say that I want to give my adherence to the proposal submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. I believe that the people of the United States ought to have the right, if they find the President of the United States is not in accord with matured public opinion, to name his successor and to do so without waiting for six years or four years if after two years they find he is not in accord with public sentiment.

The President of the United States, in my judgment, is not to be regarded as an individual. He is controlled by his environment; he is controlled by advisers; and he is controlled by influences that are brought to bear upon him in a great variety of ways. If he be of a temperament which yields to the blandishments of interests which are opposed to the interests of the American people, and that be made manifest from his conduct, I am of opinion that the people should have the right to put a masterful hand on him, take him from his seat of power, and place in his stead some man who will represent the interests, the aspirations, and the hopes of the people of this country. For that reason I am in favor of the proposed amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state for the information of the Senate the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a separate paragraph, after line 10, on page 2, the following:

The Congress shall have power to provide for the recall of the President by a popular vote at any biennial election.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and refrain from voting.

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to my colleague [Mr. GORE] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. OLIVER (when the name of Mr. PENROSE was called). My colleague [Mr. PENROSE] is out of the city to-day. If he were present on this roll call he would vote "nay." He is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. RICHARDSON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. He is absent, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair, which is with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BOURNE. I desire to announce that I am paired with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. Hence I withhold my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I desire to announce that on all the votes to be taken to-day, I have transferred my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. On this question I shall vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON. I announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. WATSON] with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS].

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 58, as follows:

YEAS—10.

Ashurst	Dixon	Owen	Thomas
Bristow	Gronna	Perky
Clapp	Martine, N. J.	Poindexter

So Mr. BRISTOW's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I now call up the amendment which I presented this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi proposes an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the committee, it is proposed to insert the following:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of President shall be four years. He shall be reeligible for one additional term of four years and not thereafter reeligible at any time. No person who shall hereafter hold the office or discharge its powers or duties or act as President by succession for any fraction of a term under the Constitution and laws made in accordance thereof shall be reeligible beyond such a fraction of a term and for one term by election.

The President, together with a Vice President chosen for the same term, shall be elected as follows.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I make the point of order that that substitute can not be considered at this time, as there are certain other amendments pending to the committee amendment. The friends of the committee amendment have a right to perfect it before any proposition that goes to the life of it is entertained.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In reply to that, I would say that I think that position hardly well taken. Here is an amendment to the joint resolution; it does not go to the life of it; it merely goes to the terms of it; it substitutes a term of eight years, with an opportunity for recall by reelection in the middle of that term, for a term of six years. I do not see that it goes to the life of the proposition, and the amendments which may be made would be useless only in the event that they were not pertinent to the main proposition.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, the proposition is clearly a substitute for the pending amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary. The gist of the substitute of the Senator from Mississippi is to preserve the old idea of two terms of four years each, adding a disqualification to hold beyond that period, whereas the proposition of the committee is to substitute for the provision now in the Constitution an entirely new provision of one term of six years. The two propositions obviously do not cover the same ground, and before we are compelled to vote on the amendment allowing two terms of four years each, with ineligibility to reelection to a third term, we ought to have the right to perfect the original proposition, so that in its final form it may be intelligently compared with the amendment with which it must contend for its life.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment reported by the committee is in the nature of a proposition to strike out certain parts of the joint resolution and to insert in lieu thereof new matter proposed by the committee. The Chair is of the opinion that the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to substitute the language proposed by him for that proposed by the committee would be in order at this time, there being no other amendment pending. If it were a substitute for the whole proposition the Chair would hold that the joint resolution as reported by the committee must be first perfected before the substitute could be offered.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, just one word before the matter is finally disposed of. It is not only a substitute for the main proposition contained in the original joint resolution, but it will be a substitute for the committee amendment of an entirely different nature, and will supersede it, because the two are not susceptible of being reconciled. It is nothing more nor less in its last analysis than a motion to substitute for the committee amendment the proposition submitted by the Senator from Mississippi. Obviously we ought to have a right to perfect the committee amendment before a motion to strike it out—because that is what it amounts to—is entertained. Individual amendments can not be considered until committee amendments have been disposed of. That is another one of our rules that would be applicable just there.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, did I understand the Chair to say there was no other amendment now pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are several amendments which have been sent to the desk to be read, and in some instances to be printed, but none has been formally offered.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, early this morning, in order to save President Elect Wilson from being put in the uncomfortable attitude of being the only President of the United States who would be specifically restricted to one four-year term, I submitted an amendment, which was read and is pending, especially eliminating Woodrow Wilson from the operation of the proposed constitutional amendment. I did not think our Democratic friends would want to put the President elect in the position standing by himself as the only man who would be so restricted. Notwithstanding the Senator from New Jersey this morning, speaking, I presume, with authority, said that Mr. Wilson never would be a candidate again, I did not think the United States Senate wanted especially to single him out for this unenviable position. That amendment was read, and I am sure is pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state, for the information of the Senate, that the Senator from Montana sent the proposed amendment to the desk, but at the time there was another amendment pending. Of course, no amendment can be offered while another amendment is pending; and so the Chair did not consider the amendment of the Senator from Montana as pending.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I do not desire to be quoted as giving utterance to the words the Senator from Montana has just credited to me, that the President elect had declared that he would never again become a candidate. I did not say just that. I said that he has declared on a number of occasions in favor of one term. I further stated that it was the policy of our party, as declared in the Baltimore convention, to favor one term, and President Elect Wilson has declared, and redeclared, his adherence to the platform of the Baltimore convention. Further than that, I had no thought of committing him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, have I not been recognized?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Have I the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey has the floor.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I yield, then, to the Senator from Mississippi. I am only too glad to yield to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield the floor?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Certainly, I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, just a word with regard to the point suggested by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. Possibly the Chair, in his ruling upon that, overlooked the fact that the Judiciary Committee itself proposed an amendment by way of a substitute for the original joint resolution. While it is probably not so denominated in the printed matter before the Senate, yet it is, in substance, a substitute. I think, under those circumstances, that if there is any proposition to perfect the substitute so offered by the committee, there should be an opportunity given for amendments of that character before an amendment for the entire substitute is considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senate joint resolution No. 78 does not purport to be a substitute for the original joint resolution as introduced. A part of the resolution is left in existence.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true, but it is the mere formal part. The effective part of the joint resolution is in the report from the Committee on the Judiciary. It is an amendment, but it would be effective in and of itself if it were adopted, while the other is merely formal and preliminary. I think, under those circumstances, the substitute offered by the Senate committee should be perfected before a different proposition is considered for the one reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi is an attempt to perfect the joint resolution in a different way from that proposed by the committee and, technically at least, is not a substitute for the entire resolution. Therefore the Chair has ruled that is in order at this time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I did not expect to have to take up this matter this evening, and I shall not be able to do the subject entire justice. I wish to say, in the first place, that there are two reasons, in my opinion, why the proposition which I offer is preferable to the amendment proffered by the committee. The first one is that a term of six years is too long if there be no opportunity for the recall of a bad officer during that time. The second is a tactical reason, and I would address myself on this subject to the friends of the proposed constitutional amendment itself.

If you go before the people with the idea of preventing a longer tenure in the Executive Office than eight years, and giving in the middle of that term a reelection, which, in the case of a bad officer acts as a recall and in the case of a good officer acts as an encouragement, you present to the people an idea with which they are already acquainted; you merely write into the Constitution what has sometimes been called "the unwritten law of the American presidential succession."

They will not be called upon to debate a new thing. It is practice as much as words which makes institutions, and that has been the practice of the American Republic. I think the tactical reason is a weighty one for those who really do desire to put an end to the real evil.

Mr. President, what is the real evil? It is that under our Constitution there is an indefinite tenure of the Executive Office; that there is a possibility of self-succession for life in the Executive Office. That is the real evil. The question as to just what the term should be, whether four, six, or eight years, is a minor question. So that when you come to fixing a presidential term and presenting the proposition to the people it is of the highest importance to present it in such a way as that it shall become a part of the Constitution and give the proposition every possible advantage arising from an existing state of public opinion.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] seems to think that we are depriving the people of some right or privilege. We are doing nothing of the kind. We are proposing to the people an amendment upon which they shall sit in judgment, to be adopted by them or to be rejected by them, under the machinery of the Constitution, as they may see fit. It is the wildest sort of talk to try to put it in any other way.

One Senator said to-day that the time might come when some great matter or, as he said, the life of the Nation might depend upon the continued service of one man. Mr. President, it may be that I have not read history carefully, but I do not know of any period in the world's history where anything worth while has depended altogether upon one man or when any great service for civilization or the world, at the head of the doing of which stood a great man, could not have been carried through with somebody else at the head of it.

What I propose is to reenforce the unwritten law of the Republic. Back of that stands the example of George Washington. Few of us realize how beneficial that example was. He did not put his reasons for it in words. He was a man whose benefits to his country consisted chiefly in acts and not much in words. But had this Republic elected George Washington for one more term, and had he died during that term—and, as a matter of fact, if he had died at the time he did die, he would have died during the term—we would have started there the precedent of a man being elected to the presidential office for life. It would have been quoted as a precedent for election for life.

The next President remained in office only one term. Had that President had a term of eight years instead of four, in my opinion, this Republic in that early day, before it had been taught to march firmly, would have gone to pieces. The alien and sedition laws had aroused such a feeling of rebellion among the people that already the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions contained veiled allusions to a dissolution of the Union—threats and menaces. The longer we remain united the more dangerous it is to attempt disunion. But at that very early day nobody at all doubted the right of a State to secede.

I have mentioned these two things because they illustrate the beauties of our working practice at both ends—first, that a man can be encouraged during a first term by reelection to a second without danger of perpetuity in office; and, secondly, that a bad policy, a dangerous policy, can be gotten rid of at the end of a short period without resort to revolution.

Jefferson gave his reasons for imitating the example of Washington, and gave them in that style which was so lucid, so clear, and so forceful that the American people have appreciated it from that time on.

Washington's example, at a time when our institutions were yet in the wet mold and not dry set, and unstable in many particulars, had not had the effect which later on, after Jefferson's statement of reasons, it had. The legislatures of eight States—and at that time they had no nominating conventions, and the legislatures nominated candidates—one after another had nominated Mr. Jefferson for a third term. Even the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], in his History of the United States, says there is no doubt about the fact that Mr. Jefferson could have been easily reelected. Amongst these eight States not one southern or southwestern State, where Jefferson was peculiarly strong, had yet spoken. Then Mr. Jefferson stopped the movement and gave the reasons, which I shall read:

> My opinion originally was that the President of the United States should have been elected for seven years and forever ineligible afterwards. I have since become sensible that seven years is too long to be irremovable and that there should be a peaceable way of withdrawing a man in midway who is doing wrong. The service for eight years, with a power to remove at the end of the first four, comes nearer to my principle as corrected by experience, and it is in adherence to that that I determine to withdraw at the end of my second term. The danger is that the indulgence and attachments of the people will keep a man in the chair after he becomes a dotard and that reelection through life shall become habitual and election for life follow that. Gen. Washington set the example of voluntary retirement after eight years. I shall follow it. And a few more precedents will oppose the obstacle of habit to anyone who after a while shall endeavor to extend his term. Perhaps it may beget a disposition to establish it by an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. I simply want to ask the Senator if that is not practically the same principle that was presented in the amendment which I offered, except that Mr. Jefferson would provide for a recall at the end of a four-year term instead of a two-year term?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Substantially it amounts to the same thing, except that this fixes a definite period for election; and the recall, if it takes place, takes place as a result of an election, the time of which is prescribed. It is different in this, of course, that under the operation of the Senator's amendment the term would be six years, and the recall might occur at the end of each two years of the term. My chief objection to that was that it would have gradually set up a condition of things where we would be electing a President every two years, or at least voting upon the election of a President every two years.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I am sorry to interrupt the Senator again; but I admit that would be the case unless the President satisfied public opinion and at the end of the first congressional term a Congress in harmony with his views were elected. Otherwise, of course, there would be another election.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to argue the Senator's amendment now; but, if I remember correctly, it provided that the people should have the power to recall at each general Federal election. That would be every two years. There would always be enough men wanting to recall the President to vote against him, and then the people who did not want to recall him would have to go and vote for him, and thus you would have a presidential campaign every two years. You could not help it to save your life under the operation of such a provision as that in the Senator's amendment.

These further words of Jefferson ought to be remembered by everybody in connection with the presidential tenure:

> If some period be not fixed, either by the Constitution or by practice, the office will, though nominally elective, become for life and then hereditary.

In what I previously read he expressed the hope that habit would make the example set by Washington the practice always of the American people; and here he tells the danger.

Gentlemen say that we are timid; that we are frightened at shadows, and all that; and then they rise in all the august majesty of a narrow nationalism and say: "We are the American people. We do not need any restrictions of majorities; we need not restrict ourselves."

Mr. President, our whole system of government is a government of restrictions placed by the people upon themselves—the Federal Government, the State government, and everything else. The American people have been peculiarly wise in this, that hitherto they have been wise enough to distrust themselves, and therefore have deliberately and purposely, in the fundamental and organic voice of the people—the Constitution of the United States and the constitutions of the various States—put restrictions upon themselves.

In the smallest matters those restrictions exist. A community frequently can not incur a debt amounting to over 50 per cent of the assessed value of its taxable property. Why not say, "The people are capable of ruling. Their wisdom is absolutely infallible. Let them incur all the debts they want to incur; it is their affair. Why restrict them at all?"

If there were an outside force restricting them, the argument would be good. But it is not good when the people restrict themselves, as they do and ought to do, not only in little matters like this but in large matters. Our forefathers in Great Britain restricted the government by the Bill of Rights, and we restrict all government in this country by the first 10 amendments to the Constitution, which constitute our Bill of Rights. Everything is a restriction upon the people, operating through their representatives, as well as upon the representatives operating against the people.

I am not one of those who believe that tyranny is a particle sweeter because it is the tyranny of a majority. I believe, with old Roger Williams, that there are two classes of things in this world—the things of the first table and the things of the second table. The things of the first table are those things which are between God and the individual man, and government has no right to touch them. If 99,999,999 of the people out of 100,000,000 wanted to do anything in connection with them and one man stood up in his right and said "No," then that one man's voice should restrain all the rest. Amongst these things are freedom of religion and various other things that will occur to your own minds. Ninety-nine per cent of the American people, I suppose, are nominally Christians. One per cent of the American people are Jews. The people have voluntarily put upon themselves restrictions with reference to that matter. They have never established the Christian religion as the religion of their country. They had the power to do it. They had the power to refuse to restrict themselves from doing it. But they decreed that for all time there should never be among us an establishment of religion. They were wise enough to know that men always, everywhere, have weaknesses. If you flatter yourself that the American people are not like the Grecian people and not like the Roman people and not like the French people, and do not share the common human nature, that is a little chauvinistic vanity that may be welcome to you and make you feel better, but there is not a particle of truth in it.

The Senator from Massachusetts said this morning that there was no danger of Cæsarism in America. The whole history of the world shows that free institutions everywhere in the world have been overturned by whom? An unpopular man was never dangerous to free institutions anywhere. They have been overturned by popular heroes, concerning whom the people thought what the Senator from Washington this morning thought—that there might occur times when one man was absolutely indispensable. One man is never absolutely indispensable, either to the people or to God or to civilization or to culture or to anything else largely worth while in this world.

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wanted to say that I did not say quite what the Senator quotes me as saying.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I misunderstood the Senator, then.

Mr. LODGE. I said that there was no danger of Cæsarism while the character of the American people was what it is; but the defense against Cæsarism rested in the character of the people, and not in constitutional barriers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The character of the American people is like the character of every other people that ever existed. We are not any wiser, we are not physically any stronger, we are not morally any better, than any other people that I know of of the white race.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Wait one moment. Thus far we have had just this advantage: We are bolder, more enterprising, more inventive, and more venturesome, for the reason that the ancestors from whose loins we came were the most venturesome and daring of the people amongst whom they lived. They therefore left the old associations of a lifetime to come into a wilderness and make their way with rifle and ax.

I think therefore that particular characteristic has come down to us. It will be bred out after a while, but to a large extent it still exists. It has made us the greatest inventive and adventuring people of the world. It makes us the great captains of industry. We are a people who peculiarly dare take chances, and individually as well as nationally and as communities. But otherwise you need not flatter yourselves that the dangers which in all history have threatened other people, and have threatened them through majorities, will never threaten us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator, after having made a very broad statement, qualified it after I had risen to put a question to him concerning it, by excluding the colored races of the world in his statement. The statement was so broad that it struck me as absolutely in conflict with the observation of everyone. That was the reason I rose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What was that?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Why, that the people of the United States were no different in the matter of government or capacity to govern themselves than any other people in the world.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not say that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think the Senator did.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not say anything about the capacity for governing themselves. That comes from experience, and of course we have had in that regard greater experience. But I do not know that we have any larger capacity to govern ourselves than our neighbors across the line in Canada. I do not think we have. I do not know that we have any larger capacity to govern ourselves than the people of the same English-speaking race in Australia and New Zealand. I doubt if we have shown any larger capacity to govern ourselves than the people left back in Great Britain, whence we came.

Mr. LODGE. How about the people across the other line to the south?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, we have a larger capacity to govern ourselves than people who never had any experience in governing themselves. I am coming to that pretty soon, because it has something to do with this very identical question. I will tell you one reason why those people have never had any capacity to govern themselves, and that is that they did not have sense enough to take the advice of the words of Thomas Jefferson, and after one term and two terms and three terms and four terms, if a man was popular, they kept him in office, until after a while the elections became a mere form and the man who went in stayed in; staying in, he did all the governing. That is one reason. But, of course, the greater reason back of it all is that they are not purely a white race; and so far I do not know of any race except the white race that has developed capacity for self-government, or perhaps one might prefer to say have had the experience which develops it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Mississippi has qualified the former statement which he made, and now admits, as I understand, that there are some races of the world that, by reason of their color, are not qualified——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Put it "by reason of their experience."

Mr. POINDEXTER. And others by reason of a lack of experience, and others by reason of not having sense enough, and others by reason of not ever having had any self-government. That includes the greater portion of the world.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Washington is making a wide divergence. I had said nothing about the American people not being better fitted than most people for self-government. I was talking about the character of the people being substantially the same. I had not referred to the question of self-government at all until the Senator interrupted me. But to return to our sheep. The passions, the prides, the prejudices, the loves, and the hates that make people do things dangerous to their own liberty exist in America just as well as they do anywhere else, and just as much as they ever existed anywhere else; perhaps owing to the brave and somewhat reckless character of our people in an emphasized degree.

They say we start at shadows. It does not seem so to those who have just actually witnessed an attempt by a very bold, brave, able, and popular man to be elected President for a third term according to his definition of a third term, and who have witnessed the fact that during that campaign he never answered the question as to whether he would run at the end of a third term for a fourth, or at the end of the fourth for a fifth, or at the end of a fifth for a sixth term. And notwithstanding that danger he received the second largest popular vote of the candidates who were running.

People who laugh at Jefferson's "suspicions," and all that, have only generally to wait long enough and their posterity begins to laugh at them.

When the Constitution was first published Jefferson said, in a letter which he wrote from France: "Your Presidency seems to be a poor edition of a Polish king"—that is, an elective monarchy.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] this morning asked, "Why single out the President, of all the elective officers, to circumscribe his term?"

The answer is self-evident. It is because the President has more power, while in office, than any monarch in all Europe, except the Czar of Russia. There is no sort of analogy between the principles that should govern the tenure of office of legislators like Senators and a man holding this gigantic power of the American Executive. Power is never dangerous except where power is great. No one Senator has any great power. No one Representative has any. No one governor has, and so it goes.

If Washington had not set his example, and if Jefferson had not followed it and given the reasons for it, which he did in his splendid way, it might have been the case that America would have furnished to the world a second example and a "poor edition of a Polish king."

Our South and Central American friends down here have furnished us with several of them. Rome furnished us with it. The consuls were elected by the people, and there was a restriction that they were eligible only for two terms. Marius was elected for the third and the fourth and the fifth and the sixth terms, and came back to Italy at the head of the legions; and Sylla did the same thing; and the whole old Roman institution went to pieces. Why, to the very latest day of the so-called Roman Republic—and they never themselves called it an empire—the emperors were "elected by the people." That was the theory—by the people of the city of Rome.

If it had not been for the example set by Washington and followed by Jefferson, and the reasons given for it, undoubtedly Washington would have been elected for life; undoubtedly Jefferson would have been elected indefinitely, if not for life, because his party elected Madison and Monroe and John Quincy Adams. Though Adams's administration was not Democratic-Republican, he was elected as a Democratic-Republican and as the candidate of that party.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That party continued, then, to elect men, so that some Senator was mistaken this morning in saying that 16 years was the longest period for which one party had been in power.

Now I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. DIXON. I am surprised at the statement of the Senator from Mississippi as to the reelection of Jefferson or any other man. The truth was that at the close of Jefferson's administration he was so very unpopular with his party that he practically held no communication with Congress. He was practically isolated at the White House during the last of his term.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to be deflected from the argument, but I ought to answer that wild variance from history in justice to history. No man, except George Washington, ever left the presidential office so popular with his party as Thomas Jefferson. Thomas Jefferson not only was President for eight years, but he was—what Mr. Roosevelt hoped to be and did not succeed in being—at one and the same time President and ex-President for 16 years afterwards. Neither Madison nor Monroe ever undertook to do any important thing without communicating with Jefferson at Monticello. About the Monroe doctrine itself, about the Spanish treaty, about everything, he was communicated with. As I said a moment ago, eight States in their legislatures begged him to become a candidate for a third term. Of the Southern States not one had spoken, because their legislatures were not in session at that time. And even a historian of the rather Federalistic leaning of my friend, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr.

LODGE], records that there is no doubt about the fact that he easily could have been reelected.

Mr. DIXON. I wish to refresh the memory of the Senator from Mississippi, with all due respect to his great historical knowledge, by the statement that his conception of Jefferson's political situation at the close of his second term is absolutely the reverse of the facts in the case at that time.

He was in the very trough of the sea of his popularity with his party and the people.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That has nothing to do with my argument. The Senator can not refresh my knowledge of history by a mere ipse dixit statement of his own. I will say that that is my opinion, then, of what history records, and the Senator may keep to his. There is this difference between us: The utterances of the legislatures of the time, the mass meetings of the time, the newspapers throughout the South and the West at the time, the resolutions passed after his retirement by the various legislatures all over the country—very many things are on the side which I hold and not on that which the Senator holds.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator will find upon fuller investigation that the situation was so acute that I think Jefferson sent no communications to Congress during its last session of his term in the White House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; that is very true as to his sending few communications after Madison's election, but it was because he had a very curious theory that after his successor was elected his successor really was the President, and that he ought not to attempt to control public affairs, but should leave them as far as possible to Mr. Madison. Mr. Madison was his warm friend, his Secretary of State, belonged to his own party, and he knew all about him.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Mississippi, I feel certain, is in the heat of his argument interpolating many things which never existed into the political history of the United States in Jefferson's administration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not interpolating a thing. If the Senator will take the trouble to read a little, he will find that in several letters Mr. Jefferson himself gave that reason for his conduct; so that I am interpolating nothing.

I was going on to say that Washington could undoubtedly have been reelected as long as he pleased; from what we know Jefferson could have been reelected as long as he pleased; Andrew Jackson could have been reelected as long as he pleased; Grant could have been reelected as long as he pleased; McKinley certainly could have been reelected once more, but for this example which Washington had set and the reasons for it given by Mr. Jefferson. Of course when I say Jackson and Grant could have been reelected, the chances are that but for the example of the one great man and the precept of the other, somebody else would have been holding the office for life and neither Jackson nor Grant could have had any chance to be elected for the first time. How long it would have taken reelections to have become mere matters of form is of course a matter of speculation, but that in the course of time they would have become mere matters of form is a matter of certainty.

An indefinitely self-successive Executive, easily turned into a dictatorship, has been, as I said a moment ago, the rock upon which the so-called South American "Republics" have split, and the good sense of the American people in taking the advice of their great men and in restricting themselves has been that which has saved our institutions from a like death of the spirit. The mention of that is the greatest tribute that can be paid to the American people. Thus far they have been the only great people who have been willing to bind themselves, as it were, in swaddling clothes with written constitutions, and then abide by the written constitutions after they had done it. They were the first people in modern times who ever undertook it.

The written constitutional idea itself was the idea that the majority of the people ought to exclude from the power of majorities certain things with which majorities ought to have nothing under the sun to do.

So all this talk about our restricting the people is—I will not say demagogic; I do not mean that exactly, but it is factitious. It is fictitious for two reasons; first, because if there is any restriction at all the people will place it upon themselves; and, secondly, because our whole Government rests upon the idea of restricting the power of majorities by an organic law.

I have something else to read. The words in which Jefferson closed his public declination are wise, I think, and patriotic. I want to call your attention to them. When these legislatures had urged him to run for the third term and when he had refused, he finally made this public announcement:

That I should lay down my charge at a proper period is as much a duty as to have borne it faithfully. If some termination to the services of the Chief Magistrate be not fixed by the Constitution, or supplied by practice, his office, nominally for years, will, in fact, become for life; and history shows how easily that degenerates into an inheritance. Believing—

Mark this, those of you who believe in popular government—

Believing that a representative government, responsible at short periods of election, is that which produces the greatest sum of happiness to mankind, I feel it a duty to do no act which shall essentially impair that principle; and I should unwillingly be the person—who, disregarding the sound precedent set by an illustrious predecessor, should furnish the first example of prolongation beyond the second term of office.

Unwillingly be the person—

Something was said here this morning about our not being bound by the acts of previous generations. Grown men now and then act like boys in a debating society when they get to arguing the question as to how far we are bound by precedents. Of course we are not bound to accept the opinions of our forefathers because they were their opinions, but we are not bound to throw them off because they thought them wise, either; and the fact that they thought them wise, other things being equal, is one reason, at any rate, why we should think them wise. The fact that what they thought was wise they adopted, and that under the institutions which they made for their government in the constitutions of the Federal Government and the States and by their practice under those constitutions, we have grown opulent and great and have remained free, recommends the things to me which they indorsed. Of course it does not recommend them to the point of saying that I must accept them solely because they accepted them.

Now, one word further. There has grown into existence lately a class of public men I would call "platformists." They seem to think that a platform is a Constitution of the United States or Holy Writ that has just been handed to them and which they must obey under all circumstances. As a general principle, a party platform ought to be carried through by the party adherents; and it is a principle as invariable as saying that when I give my word to do something I ought to try essentially and in spirit to do it. But my resolution here does not differ at all essentially from what is advocated in the Democratic platform.

The Democratic platform says that there should be "one term." It may be replied that under my resolution and the time-honored practice there are two terms of four years each. But that is a mere matter of verbiage. You can call the tenure under my resolution what Mr. Jefferson called it, if you choose, a presidential tenure of eight years, with the opportunity of recall by the people in the middle of the tenure. So, even for the strict constructionist, platformist, this is just as much one term of eight years as it is two terms of four years.

What the Democratic Party was striking at was the essential evil, and the essential evil is indefinite self-succession of the Executive, or, rather, the opportunity for indefinite self-succession in the Executive Office in a way such that elections may gradually become mere matters of form and degenerate into tenures for life, and after that, perhaps, into tenures by heredity.

I can not sufficiently emphasize the idea, which I repeat once more before I sit down, that those of us who are seeking to put some definite term to the presidential tenure will find we can obtain our purpose much more readily and certainly if we offer to the people a proposition containing an idea with which they are historically acquainted instead of offering them a new idea—if we simply say to them that we will write in words into the Constitution what Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, and McKinley thought by practice to write into it. Thus far the people have said "Washington would not, Jefferson would not, Grant could not, Roosevelt could not, and nobody else shall;" but it does not follow, necessarily, that they will always say it.

It is only, mind you, the brave, able, and popular man who is dangerous to free institutions. The Senator from Washington says that if we throw up a paper barrier in the way of those men we tempt them to upset the Constitution. No; we deprive them of the opportunity to do it, except by plain, palpable, and obvious revolution. Our institutions would not be upset by the mere fact of any man holding office for a third term.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One word further. I say they would not be upset by any man holding for a third term. They would be upset gradually, insidiously sapped—undermined—and if the man were permitted to remain in office long enough to organize his forces of various sorts—the forces that control national destiny—then, at the end of an uncertain period, the people would wake up some day and find that thing had been done without any notice that it was going to be done, and in a way such that historians would differ about fixing the exact period when the old institutions had been set aside and the new substituted—the exact moment at which the sapping and undermining had become effective. Do you imagine that the people of Rome knew that they had overturned the old Roman government even when Cæsar came back from Gaul? They did not have the slightest idea of it. Do you imagine that they knew that they would overturn the old Roman republic when they elected Marius for the sixth term as consul? They had not the slightest idea of it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator says that the ambitious man will gradually undermine the Constitution and overturn it, and in another part of his address he said that the most dangerous man was the most popular man.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said the only dangerous man to free institutions was a popular man. An unpopular man has never done them hurt.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Let me ask the Senator if, given that combination which he has described, an ambitious man and a popular man, and in some critical juncture of the Nation's affairs, in some really important issue before the people, believed that he was the man to carry out their wishes in that regard, does the Senator think that this paper resolution which you are passing here now would have any practical effect?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I know it would. I did not say as the Senator said. Precisely what I said was stronger than what he quoted me as saying. I said the only dangerous men to free institutions were popular men. They must be first bold; then they must be popular; and then they must be ambitious, unscrupulously ambitious. If you give them the three things and then give them "a crisis," they would prevail. The French people had no idea that they had overset the French Republic when they elected Napoleon Bonaparte as First Consul. They thought what the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] had in his mind a moment ago, that Napoleon was the only man who could save the French people. The French republican armies under Moreau and under Hoche had been winning victories on the Rhine and everywhere else even before Napoleon's achievements. He was the greatest general of them all, I have no doubt, but in him the French people put a man in to save the Republic who destroyed the Republic.

When they elected the third Napoleon, there being at that time popularity in name only, as President of the French Republic, they had no idea they were destroying the Republic. They did have an idea that nothing but Napoleonism could restore France to her "glory" and her greatness, and her "destiny," and all that sort of thing.

Cæsar and Napoleon the Great are good illustrations of abnormally great, bold, popular, ambitious men, each meeting with a crisis, where the fact of his ability and popularity and alleged "necessity to the State" could be urged as a reason for submitting to a coup d'état.

You are going to have crises in your history, and you are going to have men of that sort. Even if it were admitted that a paper barrier, as you call it, could not always be relied upon to prevent men of that ilk from doing their will, yet it will be some obstruction and do some good, and in ordinary times it will be absolutely effectual.

Now, if you have something that in ordinary times is absolutely effectual, then the example for the dangerously great and bold and ambitious will not be given by men less able and less ambitious and less bold, so that when the crisis comes the people can not be told nor made to believe that they are doing what they did before, and therefore, again, are the less easily deceived as to what is the real significance of what they are doing.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I do not see how the example of Napoleon is exactly in point. If I remember correctly he was elected for only one term, and he was limited by the Constitution or the laws of France to one term. In any event the question of reelection never came into his affair. In order to make Napoleon's usurpation relevant we would need to provide against any election.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not remember whether the Constitution and laws of France at that time limited the consulate to one term or not.

Mr. BORAH. It was limited to 10 years.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not remember about that. Of course he was elected to but one term when he was first elected, and he could have been elected to but one term.

Mr. BORAH. He was elected for but one term.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nor did that matter make any difference. It was a very long term, and he never served out that one term as consul, according to my recollection. He perpetrated the coup d'état during that term.

Mr. BORAH. Within the six years which we would have incorporated in our Constitution he perpetrated it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If you strike a case where a man comes into the Presidency in command of a million trained troops, yes; but the Senator must admit that does not present itself very often in the history of the world.

Mr. BORAH. Nor do we have the Napoleonic illustration very often.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If you allow a man to go into the office and be reelected indefinitely—take a man of no great ability; take myself or the Senator—if we wanted to do it; if you gave us 12, 15, or 20 years in the presidential office, no power on earth or under heaven could turn us out if we wanted to stay in.

Mr. BORAH. But the Senator from Mississippi and I would have a hard time staying there that long.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes; but there would be a possibility of it in any case unless we adopt some amendment, or unless we enforce the old practice. Thus far the American people have prevented the possibility of it by adhering to what they call their unwritten law. By the way, there are unwritten laws; this is an instance; the Monroe doctrine is another. They are almost as sacredly binding upon a people as their written law. But I am through with the discussion, Mr. President. I express the hope that the amendment may be adopted.

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Chair for a minute? The Chair desires to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the amendment he has proposed. The resolution, as reported from the committee with the committee amendment, is as follows:

Omit the part struck through and insert the part printed in italic.

That is the committee amendment. The Senator from Mississippi has proposed in lieu of the amendment reported by the committee to insert the following.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said strike out all after the resolving clause and insert.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will allow the Chair, on his own draft he will see the Chair stated it correctly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then it must have been wrong in my draft.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, if you are going to open the ruling upon my point of order and reverse your action, you have opened up another discussion of it here and I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair assumes that the Senator from Mississippi would like to have it corrected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Chair is right. Let it be in lieu of the amendment proposed by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi sees that as the language is at present, if his amendment prevails, it would leave in the resolution the language proposed to be stricken out by the committee amendment, and that would make an inconsistent resolution entirely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I see the point.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That was very earnestly presented, but the Chair did not catch the statement I made. That was the foundation on which I proceeded. I undertook to make myself clear. The Chair persists in reversing it. I do not care to open it up for discussion. So I will withdraw it and let us vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For that very reason the Chair held it was in order, because it was not a substitute.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I did not catch the Chair's reason, because it did not strike me that there was any reason to catch.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reason is this——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Chair had thought all those things, but I could not keep up with the train of thought by which he reached those conclusions.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, is it desired that the amendment be first perfected, or may I be permitted to present an amendment at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is pending the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], which he has had returned to him in order that he may modify it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I presume that the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi is intended to be a substitute for the portion of the committee amendment, on page 2, between lines 5 and 10, inclusive. If that is true, then I wish to offer a substitute for his amendment; if it is not the case, I wish to offer an amendment in lieu of that portion of the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Senator from Mississippi has offered his amendment and it is now pending. It is an amendment to an amendment, and therefore further amendments can not be offered until the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi to the amendment of the committee shall have been disposed of.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment in the nature of a substitute for that portion on page 2 of the committee amendment between lines 4 and 10, inclusive, and ask that the amendment to the amendment may be read and printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment reported by the committee, on page 2, lines 4 to 10, inclusive, it is proposed to insert the following:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of office of President shall be for four years; and no person shall be eligible for more than two terms, and no person who has served as President by succession, under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof, for the major fraction of one term, shall be eligible to hold more than one full term thereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. OWEN. I offer an amendment which I shall propose to-morrow to the joint resolution, and I ask that it be read and printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 12, after the word "be," it is proposed to strike out "elected as follows" and insert:

Nominated and elected by the direct vote of the legal voters of the States. The vote of each State shall be certified by the governor of the State to the President of the United States Senate and, estimated upon the basis that the vote of each State shall be equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may be entitled in the Congress, shall be counted and declared as by law provided. Congress shall immediately provide by law the method and means for the direct nominations herein provided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to modify my amendment—perhaps unanimous consent is necessary to enable me to do so—by inserting the following instead of the original caption:

In lieu of so much of the committee amendment as is contained in lines 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, on page 2, insert the following.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator may modify his proposed amendment as indicated. The Chair hears no objection. The Secretary will state the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

In lieu of so much of the committee amendment as is contained in lines 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, on page 2, as amended, insert the following:

"The Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of President shall be four years. He shall be reeligible for one additional term of four years, and not thereafter reeligible at any time. No person who shall hereafter hold the office or discharge its powers or duties, or act as President by succession for any fraction of a term under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof shall be reeligible beyond such a fraction of a term and for one term by election.

"The President, together with a Vice President chosen for the same term, shall be elected as follows."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if I can get the consent of the Senate—I suppose it would require unanimous consent—I think this matter is of such importance that I would rather not have the vote taken now, with the present attendance in the Senate. If I can get the consent of the Senate, I will ask that the vote on the amendment be taken at the conclusion of the vote upon the committee amendment, when there will be a fuller attendance.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, to that end the Senator had better withdraw his amendment for the present and hold it in abeyance. I think the Senator will be acting wisely to put the matter in that form.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well, I will withdraw it for the present; and I give notice that after the Senate committee amendment has been disposed of I will offer it.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the joint resolution if it is his purpose to close the matter before a recess is taken?

Mr. CUMMINS. I suppose that I am in a sense in charge of the joint resolution. I do not intend to ask for a vote to-night unless the Senate should so require; I do not think to do so would be entirely fair. A great many Senators, as I know, have been compelled already to leave the Chamber, and I should not like to see a vote taken upon any important amendment to-night.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, manifestly a vote can not be had to-night, and I think the Senator will act wisely if he does not undertake to press the matter. There will probably be a good deal of debate yet.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. I have endeavored to perfect the amendment of which I gave notice a few moments ago, and I will ask that it be read and printed in its present form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

On page 2, lines 8 and 9, strike out the words "under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof" and insert in lieu thereof the words "after the 4th day of March, 1917," so that the joint resolution will read as follows:

"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of President shall be six years; and no person who has held the office by election, or discharged its powers or duties, or acted as President after the 4th day of March, 1917, shall be eligible to again hold the office by election.

"The President, together with a Vice President, chosen for the same term, shall be elected as follows."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho desire to retain the floor?

Mr. BORAH. I was simply going to ask at what time the Senator from Iowa is going to move a recess?

Mr. CUMMINS. I intend just now to ascertain, if I can, the sense of the Senate with regard to fixing an hour to-morrow to vote upon the amendments that have been or may be offered, and upon the joint resolution itself. I have no desire whatever to press the matter to a determination until we shall have finished the debate; but I do know that we ought to reach an end of it in a reasonable time, so that we may proceed to other business. In order to test it, therefore, and without any thought of bringing the debate to a hasty conclusion, I ask unanimous consent that a vote upon the joint resolution and all amendments offered, or to be offered, may be taken at 5 o'clock to-morrow afternoon without further debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho will state his point of order.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to know, once for all, if I can, whether or not that would be a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement which we have entered into?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous-consent agreement was to vote upon "the legislative day," which may run to any calendar day. Of course, this is not a point of order——

Mr. BORAH. When we change that and fix a certain hour, is not that a modification of the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. ROOT. Not if the hour is fixed not later than 5 o'clock.

Mr. CUMMINS. I intended to be understood as asking that the hour be fixed at not later than 5 o'clock. I do not want to make the request if it is in the slightest degree an infringement of the unanimous-consent agreement, nor do I press it against the desire of any Senator. I will not even compel him to make a formal objection. If he will indicate to me that it is not agreeable to him, I will not make the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, it would not violate the unanimous-consent agreement, but that is not a question on which the Chair can rule.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I think it would be a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement. When unanimous consent was requested, I think the Senator will remember that I myself suggested that it be made "the legislative day." I had in mind the fact that there would then be no limitation of the debate on the amendments that might be offered. I was called out of the Chamber for a few moments, and this request for unanimous consent might have been granted, and that would have changed the whole purpose of the original unanimous-consent agreement if I had not accidentally come in, unless there had been some other Senator to object. While I do not want this matter to run on to any unusual time, I do not want the debate curtailed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senate has repeatedly done this very thing. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that when we were considering the so-called compensation bill I made the identical request which the Senator from Iowa now makes. It was doubted at that time whether or not that would be a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement, and I produced at that time several precedents. It is not a violation, as it seems to me, because we have now agreed that we will dispose of the joint resolution during the legislative day, and fixing the time at 5 o'clock to-morrow simply amounts to a definition of what the legislative day shall consist; in other words, it fixes an end to the legislative day to-morrow at 5 o'clock.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, I do not intend to press the request against the known desire of any Senator at this time, and inasmuch as the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] has indicated that it would not be wise, according to his view, I withdraw the request for fixing the hour to vote.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to present an amendment. I ask to have it read, printed, and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield for that purpose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly, I yield. I intend now to do nothing further, I may say, than presently to move a recess of the Senate, and I hope that any Senator who has an amendment will present it now, so that it may be printed and be on the desks of Senators to-morrow.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I present an amendment, which I ask may be read, printed, and lie on the table. I shall offer it as a substitute for the paragraph reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. As a substitute for the lines 4 to 10, inclusive, on page 2, it is proposed to insert:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of President shall be six years and no persons elected for six years after the adoption of this amendment shall be eligible again to hold the office by election.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11.45 o'clock to-morrow morning.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, before that motion is put——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa withhold his motion?

Mr. CUMMINS. I withhold it.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to give notice that on Monday next, after the morning hour, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1, to establish a department of health, and for other purposes.

RECESS.

Mr. CUMMINS. I renew my motion that the Senate take a recess until 11.45 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, January 31, 1913, at 11.45 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 30, 1913.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, O God, our heavenly Father, that back of the vast universe of which we are a part, back of our joys and sorrows, our hopes and disappointments; back of all the issues of life is infinite wisdom, power, and goodness. Yet may we not forget that Thou hast dignified Thy children with the gift of choice, and holdest them responsible for their acts; that the seeds we sow to-day will be the harvest of the morrow or some subsequent morrow.

Help us, therefore, to sow good seed that our harvest may be the fruits of joy. In Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT BY ELECTROCUTION—RETURN OF BILL BY THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a concurrent resolution of the Senate, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 39.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President be requested to return the bill (S. 7162) to amend section 801 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CLAIMS OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES FOR INJURIES.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 24121) for payment of claims for Government employees for injuries.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 24121) to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties, and other claims.

Mr. POU. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the statement be read instead of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the conference report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the statement.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1380).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24121) to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duties, and other claims, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "$22,231.38"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language stricken out insert the following: "To pay $1,500 to Oscar F. Lackey, for injuries received while in the employ of the Isthmian Canal Commission as assistant engineer in construction of the Panama Canal on November 21, 1905"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "two thousand"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 7: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following: "seven hundred and fifty"; and the Senate agree to the same.

EDWD. W. POU,
JOHN A. MAGUIRE,
WM. H. HEALD,
Managers on the part of the House.
COE I. CRAWFORD,
W. L. JONES,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24121) to pay certain employees of the Government for injuries received while in the discharge of their duty, and other claims, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language used in Senate amendment insert the following: "$22,231.38." The bill, as passed the House on May 31, carried an appropriation for $61,555.74. This bill passed the Senate July 24, with amendments, reducing the amount to $20,981.38. The conferees agreed to increase this appropriation to $22,231.38, thereby providing for all the items in the bill as agreed upon.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 2. This amendment upon the part of the Senate was striking out a period and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 3. This amendment by the Senate was striking out that part of the title of said bill, viz, "And to pay certain other claims arising under the various departments of the United States Government as hereinafter stated."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 4. The bill, as passed by the House, carried an appropriation "to pay $1,500 to Alice M. Burrows, widow of Leslie Burrows, late rural mail carrier on route No. 2, Coal Run, Ohio, who lost his life in the discharge of his duty." The Senate reduced this amount to $1,000, which said amount is hereby agreed to.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 5, and that the Senate recede from its amendment by inserting in lieu of the language stricken out the following: "To pay $1,500 to Oscar F. Lackey for injuries received while in the employ of the Isthmian Canal Commission as assistant engineer in construction of the Panama Canal on November 21, 1905."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 6, and that the Senate recede from its amendment by inserting in lieu of the language stricken out, the following: "To pay $2,000 to Pedro Sanches, as compensation for the loss of both hands, which were blown off by a premature explosion of dynamite in Culebra Cut, Canal Zone, on March 16, 1908."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 7, and that the Senate recede from its amendment by inserting in lieu of the language stricken out, the following: "To pay $750 to Benjamin Demorest, for personal injuries sustained while employed on the United States lighthouse tender Oleander on the Mississippi River;" and that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 8, striking out the following words: "And the loss of a leg."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments Nos. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15. These were items stricken from the bill by the Senate, which provided for the payment of certain claims arising under the various departments of the United States Government other than personal injuries.

And the House agree to the same.

EDWD. W. POU,
JOHN A. MAGUIRE,
WM. H. HEALD,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House Senate bill 7160, granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist upon the House amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] moves that the House insist upon the House amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. ADAIR, and Mr. FULLER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House another Senate bill with House amendments—S. 8034. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

S. 8034. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to insist upon the House amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the House insist upon the House amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. ADAIR, and Mr. FULLER.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill (S. 3175) entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, before the report is read I should like to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], in view of a statement that was made to me this morning, whether there has been any change made in this conference report now before us from the report that was last submitted?

Mr. BURNETT. I will state what changes were made, if the gentleman will permit. In the report submitted last, on the 23d of January, in the definition of aliens, it says:

That the word "alien" wherever used in this act shall include any person not a native-born or naturalized citizen of the United States, or who has not declared his intention of becoming a citizen of the United States in accordance with law.

That last clause has been stricken out by the conferees and has been inserted on page 2, exempting from the payment of head tax those who have filed their declaration of intention.

The only other change is at the bottom of page 2 of this report, where the law excluded those who have committed crimes. We strike that out and insert the old law, which is:

Persons who have been convicted of or admit having committed a felony or other crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude.

Those are the only changes.

The SPEAKER. Of course this discussion is by unanimous consent.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. It has been stated to me this morning that a change has been made in that provision which exempts certain members of a family from the operation of the literacy test; in other words, that some members of a family under 21 can not come in, although illiterate daughters under 21 may come in, which, of course, will result in separating members of families in many cases.

Mr. BURNETT. There never was anything in any of the reports that exempted sons under 21 and over 16. Those under 16 can come in, because they do not fall within the purview of the law. There is nothing at all in that.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. So that if a boy is 16½ years of age and illiterate he can not come in, while his sister, either under or over 16 years of age, can come in, and thus separation of the family will be effected, though both brother and sister are under 21 years of age.

Mr. BURNETT. There has been no change at all. That has been the way all the time. If the gentleman had read the previous reports, he would have seen that there is no change since the former conferences or since the bill passed the House, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I will ask the gentleman from Alabama whether under the conference report as now presented there would not be this separation of families effected? Take the case of a boy sixteen and a quarter years of age, illiterate, and his sister, say, 15 or 17 years of age, the sister could come in with her parents or join them, while the boy would be kept out, and if he came over would be deported?

Mr. BURNETT. It does not matter how old the daughter is; if she is single or a widow, she can come in with the parents.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I am speaking of a son or brother as young as sixteen and a quarter or sixteen and a half years of age.

Mr. BURNETT. That is the fact. If he is over 16 years of age, this separation may take place. There is no change in that. A son may be prohibited from coming in on account of being diseased. Those things frequently occur.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] reserves the right to object.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am going to insist that one thing or the other be done.

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman will wait a moment, I would like to see if we can come to an agreement.

Mr. RAKER. If I can not get legitimate questions answered, it will compel my insisting upon reading the entire report.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that the ordinary procedure is to let the matter come before the House. Then an opportunity will be given, but we ought not to proceed in this way without anything before the House.

Mr. RAKER. There will be something before the House when I get started. I want to ask a few questions concerning the matter, and it will save time——

Mr. SHERLEY. It will not save time.

Mr. MANN. Can we not have an agreement as to the time to be occupied in debate if the reading of the report is waived?

Mr. RAKER. My purpose is to ask a few questions which I think the chairman of the committee will be able to answer. If I can not have that privilege, I shall be compelled to insist upon the reading of the entire report, so that I may become familiar with the contents of it.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman may ask his questions and thus take up the time of the House, and then somebody else may require the report to be read, the waiver of which could be only by unanimous consent. Can you not agree upon the length of time to be occupied in debate, and save the reading of the report?

Mr. RAKER. That would suit me, if we can agree on it.

Mr. BURNETT. That is the very thing we are trying to do now, to reach an agreement.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that there may be 20 minutes' debate on a side on this proposition, and that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that there be 20 minutes' debate on each side, and that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask that that request be so modified as to allow 30 minutes on each side.

Mr. BURNETT. That is too long a time.

Mr. MANN. It would take an hour to read the report.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I hope that will not be done. This conference merely corrects a mistake inadvertently made. We have business piling up here, and to discuss this matter with the overwhelming sentiment of the House as it is is a waste of time that we can not afford. We have only 20 working days remaining and 10 appropriation bills to consider.

The SPEAKER. It will take an hour to read the conference report if any Member insists upon it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I trust that no gentleman will insist upon it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, if time is granted to discuss this, I want five or seven minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. I will give the gentleman five minutes of my time.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from New York give the gentleman from California two minutes of his time, as he wants seven?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read the statement.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1410).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the bill (S. 3175) entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States" having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out the text inserted by the House amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the word 'alien' wherever used in this act shall include any person not a native-born or naturalized citizen of the United States; but this definition shall not be held to include Indians not taxed or citizens of the islands under the jurisdiction of the United States. That the term 'United States' as used in the title as well as in the various sections of this act shall be construed to mean the United States and any waters, territory, or other place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, except the Isthmian Canal Zone; but if any alien shall leave the Canal Zone and attempt to enter any other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, nothing contained in this act shall be construed as permitting him to enter under any other conditions than those applicable to all aliens. That the term 'seaman' as used in this act shall include every person signed on the ship's articles and employed in any capacity on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place.

"That this act shall be enforced in the Philippine Islands by officers of the General Government thereof designated by appropriate legislation of said Government.

"SEC. 2. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a tax of $5 for every alien, including alien seamen regularly admitted as provided in this act, entering the United States. The said tax shall be paid to the collector of customs of the port or customs district to which said alien shall come, or, if there be no collector at such port or district, then to the collector nearest thereto, by the master, agent, owner, or consignee of the vessel, transportation line, or other conveyance or vehicle bringing such alien to the United States, or by the alien himself if he does not come by a vessel, transportation line, or other conveyance or vehicle. The tax imposed by this section shall be a lien upon the vessel or other vehicle of carriage or transportation bringing such aliens to the United States, and shall be a debt in favor of the United States against the owner or owners of such vessel or other vehicle, and the payment of such tax may be enforced by any legal or equitable remedy. That the said tax shall not be levied on account of aliens who have in accordance with law declared their intention of becoming citizens of the United States or on account of aliens who shall enter the United States after an uninterrupted residence of at least one year, immediately preceding such entrance, in the Dominion of Canada, Newfoundland, the Republic of Cuba, or the Republic of Mexico, nor on account of otherwise admissible residents of any possession of the United States, nor on account of aliens in transit through the United States, nor upon aliens who have been lawfully admitted to the United States and who later shall go in transit from one part of the United States to another through foreign contiguous territory: Provided, That the Commissioner General of Immigration, under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, by agreement with transportation lines, as provided in section 23 of this act, may arrange in some other manner for the payment of the tax imposed by this section upon any or all aliens seeking admission from foreign contiguous territory: Provided further, That said tax, when levied upon aliens entering the Philippine Islands, shall be paid into the treasury of said islands, to be expended for the benefit of such islands: Provided further, That in the cases of aliens applying for admission from foreign contiguous territory and rejected, the head tax collected shall upon application be refunded to the alien: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to aliens arriving in Guam or Hawaii; but if any such alien, not having become a citizen of the United States, shall later arrive at any port or place of the United States on the North American Continent, the provisions of this section shall apply.

"SEC. 3. That the following classes of aliens shall be excluded from admission into the United States: All idiots, imbeciles, feeble-minded persons, epileptics, insane persons, and persons who have been insane within five years previous; persons who have had one or more attacks of insanity at any time previously; paupers; persons likely to become a public charge; professional beggars; vagrants; persons afflicted with tuberculosis in any form or with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease; persons not comprehended within any of the foregoing excluded classes who are found to be and are certified by the examining surgeon as being mentally or physically defective, such mental or physical defect being of a nature which may affect the ability of such alien to earn a living; persons who have been convicted of or admit having committed a felony or other crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude; polygamists, or persons who admit their belief in the practice of polygamy; anarchists, or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or of all forms of law, or who disbelieve in or are opposed to organized government, or who advocate the assassination of public officials; persons who are members of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or who advocate or teach the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character; prostitutes, or women or girls coming into the United States for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose; persons who procure or attempt to bring in prostitutes or women or girls for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose; persons who are supported by or receive in whole or in part the proceeds of prostitution; persons hereinafter called contract laborers, who have been induced, assisted, encouraged, or solicited to migrate to this country by offers or promises of employment, whether such offers or promises are true or false, or in consequence of agreements, oral, written or printed, express or implied, to perform labor in this country of any kind, skilled or unskilled; persons who have come in consequence of advertisements for laborers printed, published, or distributed in a foreign country; persons who have been deported under any of the provisions of this act, and who may again seek admission within one year from the date of such deportation, unless prior to their reembarkation at a foreign port, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall have consented to their reapplying for admission; persons whose ticket or passage is paid for with the money of another, or who is assisted by others to come, unless it is affirmatively and satisfactorily shown that such person does not belong to one of the foregoing excluded classes; persons whose ticket or passage is paid for by any corporation, association, society, municipality, or foreign Government, either directly or indirectly; stowaways, except that any such stowaway may be admitted in the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor; all children under 16 years of age, unaccompanied by one or both of their parents, at the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor or under such regulations as he may from time to time prescribe; persons who can not become eligible, under existing law, to become citizens of the United States by naturalization, unless otherwise provided for by existing agreements as to passports, or by treaties, conventions, or agreements that may hereafter be entered into. The provision next foregoing, however, shall not apply to persons of the following status or occupations: Government officers, ministers or religious teachers, missionaries, lawyers, physicians, chemists, engineers, teachers, students, authors, editors, journalists, merchants, bankers, and travelers for curiosity or pleasure, nor to their legal wives or their chilren under 16 years of age who shall accompany them or who subsequently may apply for admission to the United States, but such persons or their legal wives or foreign-born children who fail to maintain in the United States a status or occupation placing them within the excepted classes shall be deemed to be in the United States contrary to law, and shall be subject to deportation as provided in section 19 of this act.

"That after four months from the approval of this act, in addition to the aliens who are by law now excluded from admission into the United States, the following persons shall also be excluded from admission thereto, to wit:

"All aliens over 16 years of age, physically capable of reading, who can not read the English language, or some other language or dialect, including Hebrew or Yiddish: Provided, That any admissible alien or any alien heretofore or hereafter legally admitted, or any citizen of the United States, may bring in or send for his father or grandfather over 55 years of age, his wife, his mother, his grandmother, or his unmarried or widowed daughter, if otherwise admissible, whether such relative can read or not; and such relatives shall be permitted to enter. That for the purpose of ascertaining whether aliens can read the immigrant inspectors shall be furnished with slips, of uniform size, prepared under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, each containing not less than 30 nor more than 40 words in ordinary use, printed in plainly legible type in the various languages and dialects of immigrants. Each alien may designate the particular language or dialect in which he desires the examination to be made, and shall be required to read the words printed on the slip in such language or dialect. No two aliens coming in the same vessel or other vehicle of carriage or transportation shall be tested with the same slip. That the following classes of persons shall be exempt from the operation of the illiteracy test, to wit: All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that they are seeking admission to the United States solely for the purpose of escaping from religious persecution; all aliens in transit through the United States; all aliens who have been lawfully admitted to the United States and who later shall go in transit from one part of the United States to another through foreign contiguous territory: Provided, That nothing in this act shall exclude, if otherwise admissible, persons convicted of an offense purely political, not involving moral turpitude: Provided further, That the provisions of this act relating to the payments for tickets or passage by any corporation, association, society, municipality, or foreign government shall not apply to the tickets or passage of aliens in immediate and continuous transit through the United States to foreign contiguous territory: Provided further, That skilled labor, if otherwise admissible, may be imported if labor of like kind unemployed can not be found in this country, and the question of the necessity of importing such skilled labor in any particular instance may be determined by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor upon the application of any person interested, such application to be made before such importation, and such determination by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to be reached after a full hearing and an investigation into the facts of the case; but such determination shall not become final until a period of 30 days has elapsed. Within three days after such determination the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall cause to be published a brief statement reciting the substance of the application, the facts presented at the hearing and his determination thereon, in three daily newspapers of general circulation in three of the principal cities of the United States. At any time during said period of 30 days any person dissatisfied with the ruling may appeal to the district court of the United States of the district into which the labor is sought to be brought, which court or the judge thereof in vacation shall have jurisdiction to try de novo such question of necessity, and the decision in such court shall be final. Such appeal shall operate as a supersedeas: Provided further, That the provisions of this law applicable to contract labor shall not be held to exclude professional actors, artists, lecturers, singers, ministers of any religious denomination, professors for colleges or seminaries, persons belonging to any recognized learned profession, or persons employed strictly as personal or domestic servants: Provided further, That whenever the President shall be satisfied that passports issued by any foreign government to its citizens or subjects to go to any country other than the United States or to any insular possession of the United States or to the Canal Zone are being used for the purpose of enabling the holder to come to the continental territory of the United States to the detriment of labor conditions therein, the President shall refuse to permit such citizens or subjects of the country issuing such passports to enter the continental territory of the United States from such other country or from such insular possessions or from the Canal Zone: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent, hinder, or restrict any alien exhibitor, or holder of a concession or privilege for any fair or exposition authorized by act of Congress, from bringing into the United States, under contract, such alien mechanics, artisans, agents, or other employees, natives of his country, as may be necessary for installing or conducting his exhibit or for preparing for installing or conducting any business authorized or permitted under any concession or privilege which may have been or may be granted by any such fair or exposition in connection therewith, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, may prescribe both as to the admission and return of such persons: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to accredited officials of foreign governments nor to their suites, families, or guests: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall exclude the wife or minor children of a citizen of the United States.

"SEC. 4. That the importation into the United States of any alien for the purpose of prostitution, or for any other immoral purpose, is hereby forbidden; and whoever shall, directly or indirectly, import, or attempt to import, into the United States any alien for the purpose of prostitution, or for any other immoral purpose, or shall hold or attempt to hold any alien for any such purpose in pursuance of such illegal importation, or shall keep, maintain, control, support, employ, or harbor in any house or other place, for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose, any alien, in pursuance of such illegal importation, shall in every such case be deemed guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not more than 10 years and by a fine of not more than $5,000. Jurisdiction for the trial and punishment of the felonies hereinbefore set forth shall be in any district to or into which said alien is brought in pursuance of said importation by the person or persons accused, or in any district in which a violation of any of the foregoing provisions of this section occur. That any alien who shall, after he has been excluded and deported or arrested and deported in pursuance of the provisions of this act which relate to prostitutes, procurers, or other like immoral persons, attempt thereafter to return to or to enter the United States shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not more than two years. In all prosecutions under this section the testimony of a husband or wife shall be admissible and competent evidence against a wife or husband.

"SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful for any person, company, partnership, or corporation, in any manner whatsoever, to prepay the transportation or in any way to induce, assist, encourage, or solicit the importation or migration of any contract laborer or contract laborers into the United States, unless such contract laborer or contract laborers are exempted under the provisions of section 3 of this act, and for every violation of any of the provisions of this section the person, partnership, company, or corporation violating the same shall forfeit and pay for every such offense the sum of $1,000, which may be sued for and recovered by the United States, or by any person who shall first bring his action therefor in his own name and for his own benefit, including any such aliens thus offered or promised employment as aforesaid, as debts of like amount are now recovered in the courts of the United States; or for every violation of the provisions hereof the person violating the same may be prosecuted in a criminal action for a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term of not less than six months nor more than two years; and under either the civil or the criminal procedure mentioned separate suits or prosecutions may be brought for each alien thus offered or promised employment as aforesaid.

"SEC. 6. That it shall be unlawful and be deemed a violation of section 5 of this act to induce, assist, encourage, or solicit any alien to come into the United States by promise of employment through advertisements printed, published, or distributed in any foreign country, whether such promise is true or false, and either the civil or the criminal penalty imposed by said section shall be applicable to such a case: Provided, That States or Territories, the District of Columbia, or places subject to the jurisdiction of the United States may advertise, and by written or oral communication with prospective alien settlers make known, the inducements they offer for immigration thereto, respectively.

"SEC. 7. That it shall be unlawful for any person, association, society, company, partnership, corporation, or others engaged in the business of transporting aliens to the United States, including owners, masters, officers, and agents of vessels, directly or indirectly, by writing, printing, or oral representation, to solicit, invite, or encourage any alien to come into the United States, and anyone violating any provision hereof shall be subject to either the civil or the criminal prosecution prescribed by section 5 of this act; or if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that any owner, master, officer, or agent of a vessel has brought or caused to be brought to a port of the United States any alien so solicited, invited, or encouraged to come by such owner, master, officer, or agent, such owner, master, officer, or agent shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located or in which any vessel of the line may be found the sum of $400 for each and every such violation; and no vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while the fine imposed remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such questions upon the deposit with the collector of customs of a sum sufficient to cover such fine: Provided further, That whenever it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that the provisions of this section are persistently violated by or on behalf of any transportation company, it shall be the duty of said Secretary to deny to such company the privilege of landing alien immigrant passengers of any or all classes at United States ports for such a period as in his judgment may be necessary to insure an observance of such provisions: Provided further, That this section shall not be held to prevent transportation companies from issuing letters, circulars, or advertisements, confined strictly to stating the sailings of their vessels and terms and facilities of transportation therein.

"SEC. 8. That any person, including the master, agent, owner, or consignee of any vessel, who shall bring into or land in the United States, by vessel or otherwise, or shall attempt, by himself or through another, to bring into or land in the United States, by vessel or otherwise, or shall conceal or harbor, or attempt to conceal or harbor, or assist or abet another to conceal or harbor in any place, including any building, vessel, railway car, conveyance, or vehicle, any alien not duly admitted by an immigrant inspector or not lawfully entitled to enter or to reside within the United States under the terms of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment for each and every alien so landed or brought in or attempted to be landed or brought in.

"SEC. 9. That it shall be unlawful for any person, including any transportation company other than railway lines entering the United States from foreign contiguous territory, or the owner, master, agent, or consignee of any vessel, to bring to the United States any alien afflicted with idiocy, insanity, imbecility, epilepsy, tuberculosis in any form, or a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was afflicted with any of the said diseases or disabilities at the time of foreign embarkation, and that the existence of such disease or disability might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person or transportation company, or the master, agent, owner, or consignee of any such vessel, shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $200 for each and every violation of the provisions of this section. It shall also be unlawful for any such person to bring to any port of the United States any alien afflicted with any mental or physical defect of a nature which may affect his ability to earn a living, as contemplated in section 3 of this act, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was so afflicted at the time of foreign embarkation, and that the existence of such mental or physical defect might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $25 for each and every violation of this provision. It shall also be unlawful for any such person to bring to any port of the United States any alien who is excluded by the provisions of section 3 of this act because unable to read or who can not become eligible, under existing law, to become a citizen of the United States by naturalization, as provided in section 3 of this act, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that these disabilities might have been detected by the exercise of reasonable precaution prior to the departure of such aliens from a foreign port such person shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $100 for each and every violation of this provision. And no vessel shall be granted clearance papers pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while the fine remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such questions upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine and costs, such sum to be named by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

"SEC. 10. That it shall be the mandatory and unqualified duty of every person, including owners, officers, and agents of vessels or transportation lines, other than those lines which may enter into a contract as provided in section 23 of this act, bringing an alien to any seaport or land border port of the United States to prevent the landing of such alien in the United States at any time or place other than as designated by the immigration officers, and the failure of any such owner, officer, or agent to comply with the foregoing requirements shall be deemed a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine in each case of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment; or, if in the opinion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor it is impracticable or inconvenient to prosecute the owner, master, officer, or agent of any such vessel, a pecuniary penalty of $1,000 shall be a lien upon the vessel whose owner, master, officer, or agent violates the provisions of this section, and such vessel shall be libeled therefor in the appropriate United States court.

"SEC. 11. That whenever he may deem such action necessary the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may, at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, detail immigrant inspectors and matrons of the United States Immigration Service for duty on vessels carrying immigrant or emigrant passengers, or passengers other than first and second cabin passengers, between ports of the United States and foreign ports. On such voyages said inspectors and matrons shall remain in that part of the vessel where immigrant passengers are carried. It shall be the duty of such inspectors and matrons to observe such passengers during the voyage and report to the immigration authorities in charge at the port of landing any information of value in determining the admissibility of such passengers under the laws regulating immigration of aliens into the United States. It shall further be the duty of such inspectors and matrons to observe violations of the provisions of such laws and the violation of such provisions of the "passenger act" of August 2, 1882, as amended as relate to the care and treatment of immigrant passengers at sea, and report the same to the proper United States officials at ports of landing. Whenever the Secretary of Commerce and Labor so directs, a surgeon of the United States Public Health Service, detailed to the Immigration Service, not lower in rank than a passed assistant surgeon, shall be received and carried on any vessel transporting immigrant or emigrant passengers, or passengers other than first and second cabin passengers, between ports of the United States and foreign ports. Such surgeon shall be permitted to investigate and examine the condition of all immigrant and emigrant passengers in relation to any provisions of the laws regulating the immigration of aliens into the United States and such provisions of the "passenger act" of August 2, 1882, as amended as relate to the care and treatment of immigrant passengers at sea, and shall immediately report any violation of said laws to the master or commanding officer of the vessel, and shall also report said violations to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor within 24 hours after the arrival of the vessel at the port of entry in the United States. Such surgeon shall accompany the master or captain of the vessel in his visits to the sanitary officers of the ports of call during the voyage, and, should contagious or infectious diseases prevail at any port where passengers are received, he shall request all reasonable precautionary measures for the health of persons on board. Such surgeon on arrival at ports of the United States shall also, if requested by the examining board, furnish any information he may possess in regard to immigrants arriving on the vessel to which he has been detailed. While on duty such surgeons shall wear the prescribed uniform of their service and shall be provided with first-class accommodations on such vessel at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. For every violation of this section any person, including any transportation company, owning or operating the vessel in which such violation occurs shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the next United States port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000 for each and every day during which such violation continues, the term "violation" to include the refusal of any person having authority so to do to permit any such immigrant inspector, matron, or surgeon to be received on board such vessel, as provided in this section, and also the refusal of the master or commanding officer of any such vessel to permit the inspections and visits of any such surgeon, as provided in this section, and no vessel shall be granted clearance papers pending the determination of the question of the liability of such fine, or while it remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of all such questions upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine and costs, such sum to be named by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

"SEC. 12. That upon the arrival of any alien by water at any point within the United States on the North American Continent from a foreign port or a port of the Philippine Islands, Guam, Porto Rico, or Hawaii, or at any port of the said insular possessions from any foreign port, from a port in the United States on the North American Continent, or from a port of another insular possession of the United States, it shall be the duty of the master or commanding officer, owners or consignees of the steamer, sailing, or other vessel having said alien on board to deliver to the immigration officers at the port of arrival lists or manifests made at the time and place of embarkation of such alien on board such steamer or vessel, which shall, in answer to questions at the top of said list, contain full and accurate information as to each alien, as follows: Full name, age, and sex; whether married or single; calling or occupation, personal description (including height, complexion, color of hair and eyes, and marks of identification); whether able to read; nationality; country of birth; race; country of last permanent residence; name and address of the nearest relative in the country from which the alien came; seaport for landing in the United States; final destination, if any, beyond the port of landing; whether having a ticket through to such final destination; by whom passage was paid; whether going to join a relative or friend, and if so, what relative or friend, and his or her name and complete address; whether ever before in the United States, and if so, when and where; whether ever in prison or almshouse or an institution or hospital for the care and treatment of the insane or supported by charity; whether a polygamist; whether an anarchist; whether a person who believes in or advocates the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law, or who disbelieves in or is opposed to organized government, or who advocates the assassination of public officials, or is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or who advocates or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character; whether coming by reason of any offer, solicitation, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to perform labor in the United States; the alien's condition of health, mental and physical; whether deformed or crippled, and if so, for how long and from what cause; and such master or commanding officer, owners, or consignees shall also furnish information in relation to the sex, age, class of travel, and the foreign port of embarkation of arriving passengers who are United States citizens. That it shall further be the duty of the master or commanding officer of every vessel taking passengers from any port of the United States on the North American Continent to a foreign port or a port of the Philippine Islands, Guam, Porto Rico, or Hawaii, or from any port of the said insular possession to any foreign port, to a port of the United States on the North American Continent, or to a port of another insular possession of the United States to file with the immigration officials before departure a list which shall contain full and accurate information in relation to the following matters regarding all alien passengers and all citizens of the United States or insular possessions of the United States departing with the stated intent to reside permanently in a foreign country, taken on board: Name, age, and sex; whether married or single; calling or occupation; whether able to read; nationality; country of birth; country of which citizen or subject; race; last permanent residence in the United States or insular possessions thereof; if a citizen of the United States or of the insular possessions thereof, whether native born or naturalized; intended future permanent residence; and time and port of last arrival in the United States or insular possessions thereof; and such master or commanding officer shall also furnish information in relation to the sex, age, class of travel, and port of debarkation of the United States citizens departing who do not intend to reside permanently in a foreign country, and no master of any such vessel shall be granted clearance papers for his vessel until he has deposited such list or lists with the immigration officials at the port of departure and made oath that they are full and complete as to the name and other information herein required concerning each person of the classes specified taken on board his vessel; and any neglect or omission to comply with the requirements of this section shall be punishable as provided in section 14 of this act: Provided, That in the case of vessels making regular trips to ports of the United States the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, may, when expedient, arrange for the delivery of such lists of outgoing aliens at a later date: Provided further, That it shall be the duty of immigration officials to record the following information regarding every resident alien and citizen leaving the United States by way of the Canadian or Mexican borders for permanent residence in a foreign country: Name, age, and sex; whether married or single; calling or occupation; whether able to read; nationality; country of birth; country of which citizen or subject; race; last permanent residence in the United States; intended future permanent residence; and time and port of last arrival in the United States; and if a United States citizen, whether native born or naturalized.

"SEC. 13. That all aliens arriving by water at the ports of the United States shall be listed in convenient groups, the names of those coming from the same locality to be assembled so far as practicable, and no one list or manifest shall contain more than 30 names. To each alien or head of a family shall be given a ticket on which shall be written his name, a number or letter designating the list in which his name, and so forth, are contained, and his number on said list, for convenience of identification on arrival. Each list or manifest shall be verified by the signature and the oath or affirmation of the master or commanding officer, or the first or second below him in command, taken before an immigration officer at the port of arrival, to the effect that he has caused the surgeon of said vessel sailing therewith to make a physical and oral examination of each of said aliens, and that from the report of said surgeon and from his own investigation he believes that no one of said aliens is of any of the classes excluded from admission into the United States by section 3 of this act, and that also according to the best of his knowledge and belief, the information in said lists or manifests concerning each of said aliens named therein is correct and true in every respect. That the surgeon of said vessel sailing therewith shall also sign each of said lists or manifests and make oath or affirmation in like manner before an immigration officer at the port of arrival, stating his professional experience and qualifications as a physician and surgeon, and that he has made a personal examination of each of the said aliens named therein, and that the said list or manifest, according to the best of his knowledge and belief, is full, correct, and true in all particulars relative to the mental and physical condition of said aliens. If no surgeon sails with any vessel bringing aliens the mental and physical examinations and the verifications of the lists or manifests shall be made by some competent surgeon employed by the owners of the said vessels, and the manifests shall be verified by such surgeon before a United States consular officer.

"SEC. 14. That it shall be unlawful for the master or commanding officer of any vessel bringing aliens into or carrying aliens out of the United States to refuse or fail to deliver to the immigration officials the accurate and full manifests or statements or information regarding all aliens on board or taken on board such vessel required by this act, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that there has been such a refusal or failure, or that the lists delivered are not accurate and full, such master or commanding officer shall pay to the collector of customs at the port of arrival or departure the sum of $10 for each alien, concerning whom such accurate and full manifest or statement or information is not furnished, or concerning whom the manifest or statement or information is not prepared and sworn to as prescribed by this act. No vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while it remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit with the collector of customs of a sum sufficient to cover such fine.

"SEC. 15. That upon the arrival at a port of the United States of any vessel bringing aliens it shall be the duty of the proper immigration officials to go or to send competent assistants to the vessel and there inspect all such aliens, or said immigration officials may order a temporary removal of such aliens for examination at a designated time and place, but such temporary removal shall not be considered a landing, nor shall it relieve the transportation lines, masters, agents, owners, or consignees of the vessel upon which said aliens are brought to any port of the United States from any of the obligations which, in case such aliens remain on board, would, under the provisions of this act bind the said transportation lines, masters, agents, owners, or consignees: Provided, That where removal is made to premises owned or controlled by the United States, said transportation lines, masters, agents, owners, or consignees, and each of them shall, so long as detention there lasts, be relieved of responsibility for the safekeeping of such aliens. Whenever a temporary removal of aliens is made the transportation lines which brought them and the masters, owners, agents, and consignees of the vessel upon which they arrive shall pay all expenses of such removal and all expenses arising during subsequent detention, pending decision on the aliens' eligibility to enter the United States and until they are either allowed to land or returned to the care of the line or to the vessel which brought them, such expenses to include those of maintenance, medical treatment in hospital or elsewhere, burial in the event of death, and transfer to the vessel in the event of deportation, excepting only where they arise under the terms of any of the provisos of section 18 thereof. Any refusal or failure to comply with the provisions hereof to be punished in the manner specified in section 18 of this act.

"SEC. 16. That the physical and mental examination of all arriving aliens shall be made by medical officers of the United States Public Health Service who shall have had at least two years' experience in the practice of their profession since receiving the degree of doctor of medicine, and who shall certify, for the information of the immigration officers and the boards of special inquiry hereinafter provided for, any and all physical and mental defects or diseases observed by said medical officers in any such alien; or, should medical officers of the United States Public Health Service be not available, civil surgeons of not less than four years' professional experience may be employed in such emergency for such service, upon such terms as may be prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. Medical officers of the United States Public Health Service who have had especial training in the diagnosis of insanity and mental defect shall be detailed for duty or employed at all large ports of entry, and such medical officers shall be provided with suitable facilities for the detention and examination of all arriving aliens in whom insanity or mental defect is suspected, and the services of interpreters shall be provided for such examination. That the inspection, other than the physical and mental examination, of aliens, including those seeking admission or readmission to or the privilege of passing through or residing in the United States, and the examination of aliens arrested within the United States under this act, shall be conducted by immigrant inspectors, except as hereinafter provided in regard to boards of special inquiry. Immigrant inspectors are hereby authorized and empowered to board and search for aliens any vessel, railway car, conveyance, or vehicle in which they believe aliens are being brought into the United States. Said inspectors shall have power to administer oaths and to take and consider evidence touching the right of any alien to enter, reenter, pass through, or reside in the United States, and, where such action may be necessary, to make a written record of such evidence; and any person to whom such an oath has been administered, under the provisions of this act, who shall knowingly or willfully give false evidence or swear to any false statement in any way affecting or in relation to the right of any alien to admission, or readmission to, or to pass through, or to reside in the United States shall be deemed guilty of perjury and be punished as provided by section 125 of the act approved March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States." Any commissioner of immigration or inspector in charge shall also have power to require the attendance and testimony of witnesses before said inspectors and the production of books, papers, and documents touching the right of any alien to enter, reenter, reside in, or pass through the United States, and to that end may invoke the aid of any court of the United States; and any district court within the jurisdiction of which investigations are being conducted by an immigrant inspector may, in the event of neglect or refusal to respond to a subpœna issued by any commissioner of immigration or inspector in charge or refusal to testify before said immigrant inspector, issue an order requiring such person to appear before said immigrant inspector, produce books, papers, and documents, if demanded, and testify; and any failure to obey such order of the court shall be punished by the court as a contempt thereof. That any person, including employees, officials, or agents of transportation companies, who shall assault, resist, prevent, impede, or interfere with any immigration official or employee in the performance of his duty under this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not less than six months nor more than two years, or by a fine of not less than $200 nor more than $2,000; and any person who shall use any deadly or dangerous weapon in resisting any immigration official or employee in the performance of his duty shall be deemed guilty of a felony and shall on conviction thereof be punished by imprisonment for not less than one nor more than 10 years. Every alien who may not appear to the examining immigrant inspector at the port of arrival to be clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to land shall be detained for examination in relation thereto by a board of special inquiry. In the event of rejection by the board of special inquiry, in all cases where an appeal to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is permitted by this act, the alien shall be so informed and shall have the right to be represented by counsel or other adviser on such appeal. The decision of an immigrant inspector, if favorable to the admission of any alien, shall be subject to challenge by any other immigrant inspector, and such challenge shall operate to take the alien whose right to land is so challenged before a board of special inquiry for its investigation.

"SEC. 17. That boards of special inquiry shall be appointed by the commissioner of immigration or inspector in charge at the various ports of arrival as may be necessary for the prompt determination of all cases of immigrants detained at such ports under the provisions of the law. Each board shall consist of three members, who shall be selected from such of the immigrant officials in the service as the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, shall from time to time designate as qualified to serve on such boards. When in the opinion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the maintenance of a permanent board of special inquiry for service at any sea or land border port is not warranted, regularly constituted boards may be detailed from other stations for temporary service at such port, or, if that be impracticable, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall authorize the creation of boards of special inquiry by the immigration officials in charge at such ports, and shall determine what Government officials or other persons shall be eligible for service on such boards. Such boards shall have authority to determine whether an alien who has been duly held shall be allowed to land or shall be deported. All hearings before such boards shall be separate and apart from the public.

Such boards shall keep a complete permanent record of their proceedings and of all such testimony as may be produced before them; and the decision of any two members of a board shall prevail, but either the alien or any dissenting member of the said board may appeal through the commissioner of immigration at the port of arrival and the Commissioner General of Immigration to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and the taking of such appeal shall operate to stay any action in regard to the final disposal of any alien whose case is so appealed until the receipt by the commissioner of immigration at the port of arrival of such decision, which shall be rendered solely upon the evidence adduced before the board of special inquiry. In every case where an alien is excluded from admission into the United States, under any law or treaty now existing or hereafter made, the decision of a board of special inquiry if adverse to the admission of such alien shall be final, unless reversed on appeal to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor: Provided, That the decision of a board of special inquiry, based upon the certificate of the examining medical officer, shall be final as to the rejection of aliens affected with tuberculosis in any form or with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, or with any mental or physical disability which would bring such aliens within any of the classes excluded from admission to the United States under section 3 of this act.

"SEC. 18. That all aliens brought to this country in violation of law shall, if practicable, be immediately sent back, in accommodations of the same class in which they arrived, to the country whence they respectively came on the vessels bringing them. The cost of their maintenance while on land, as well as the expense of the return of such aliens, shall be borne by the owner or owners of the vessels on which they respectively came. That it shall be unlawful for any master, purser, person in charge, agent, owner, or consignee of any such vessel to refuse to receive back on board thereof, or on board of any other vessel owned or operated by the same interests, such aliens; or to fail to detain them thereon; or to refuse or fail to return them in the manner aforesaid to the foreign port from which they came; or to pay the cost of their maintenance while on land; or to make any charge for the return of any such alien; or to take any security from him for the payment of such charge; or to take any consideration to be returned in case the alien is landed; or knowingly to bring to the United States at any time within one year from the date of deportation any alien rejected or arrested and deported under any provision of this act, unless prior to reembarkation the Secretary of Commerce and Labor has consented that such alien shall reapply for admission, as required by section 3 hereof; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that such master, purser, person in charge, agent, owner or consignee has violated any of the foregoing provisions such master, purser, person in charge, agent, owner, or consignee shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located, or in which any vessel of the line may be found, the sum of $300 for each and every violation of any provision of this section; and no vessel shall have clearance from any port of the United States while any such fine is unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit with the collector of customs of a sum sufficient to cover such fine. If the vessel by which any alien ordered deported came has left the United States and it is impracticable for any reason to deport the alien within a reasonable time by another vessel owned by the same interests, the cost of deportation may be paid by the Government and recovered by civil suit from any agent, owner, or consignee of the vessel: Provided further, That the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, may suspend, upon conditions to be prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, the deportation of any alien found to have come in violation of any provision of this act, if, in his judgment, the testimony of such alien is necessary on behalf of the United States Government in the prosecution of offenders against any provision of this act; and the cost of maintenance of any person so detained resulting from such suspension of deportation, and a witness fee in the sum of $1 per day for each day such person is so detained, may be paid from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, or such alien may be released under bond, in the penalty of not less than $500, with security approved by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, conditioned that such alien shall be produced when required as a witness and for deportation. No alien certified, as provided in section 16 of this act, to be suffering from tuberculosis in any form, or from a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease other than one of quarantinable nature, shall be permitted to land for medical treatment thereof in any hospital in the United States, unless with the express permission of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor: Provided further, That upon the certificate of a medical officer of the United States Public Health Service to the effect that the health or safety of an insane alien would be unduly imperiled by immediate deportation, such alien may, at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, be held for treatment until such time as such alien may, in the opinion of such medical officer, be safely deported: Provided further, That upon the certificate of a medical officer of the United States Public Health Service to the effect that a rejected alien is helpless from sickness, mental or physical disability, or infancy, if such alien is accompanied by another alien whose protection or guardianship is required by such rejected alien, such accompanying alien may also be excluded, and the master, agent, owner, or consignee of the vessel in which such alien and accompanying alien are brought shall be required to return said alien and accompanying alien in the same manner as vessels are required to return other rejected aliens.

"SEC. 19. That any alien, at any time within three years after entry, who shall enter the United States in violation of law; any alien who within three years after entry becomes a public charge from causes existing prior to the landing; except as hereinafter provided, any alien who is hereafter sentenced to imprisonment for a term of one year or more because of conviction in this country of a crime involving moral turpitude, committed within three years after the entry of the alien to the United States; any alien who shall be found an inmate of or connected with the management of a house of prostitution or practicing prostitution after such alien shall have entered the United States, or who shall receive, share in, or derive benefit from any part of the earnings of any prostitute; any alien who is employed by, in, or in connection with any house of prostitution or music or dance hall or other place of amusement or resort habitually frequented by prostitutes, or where prostitutes gather, or who any way assists, protects, or promises to protect from arrest any prostitute; any alien who shall import or attempt to import any person for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose; any alien who, after being excluded and deported or arrested and deported as a prostitute, or as a procurer, or as having been connected with the business of prostitution or importation for prostitution or other immoral purposes in any of the ways hereinbefore specified shall return to and enter the United States; any alien convicted and imprisoned for a violation of any of the provisions of section 4 hereof; any alien, at any time within three years after entry, who shall enter the United States by water at any time or place other than as designated by immigration officials, or by land at any place other than one designated as a port of entry for aliens by the Commissioner General of Immigration, or at any time not designated by immigration officials, shall, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, be taken into custody and deported: Provided, That the provision of this section respecting the deportation of aliens convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude shall not apply to one who has been pardoned, nor shall such deportation be made or directed if the court sentencing such alien for such crime shall, at the time of imposing judgment or passing sentence, make a recommendation to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that such alien shall not be deported in pursuance of this act; nor shall any alien convicted as aforesaid be deported until after the termination of his imprisonment: Provided further, That the provisions of this section, with the exceptions hereinbefore noted, shall be applicable to the classes of aliens therein mentioned irrespective of the time of their entry into the United States. In every case where any person is ordered deported from the United States under the provisions of this act or of any law or treaty now existing, the decision of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall be final.

"SEC. 20. That the deportation of aliens provided for in this act shall, at the option of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, be to the country whence they came or to the foreign port at which such aliens embarked for the United States; or, if such embarkation was for foreign contiguous territory, to the foreign port at which they embarked for such territory; or, if such aliens entered foreign contiguous territory from the United States and later entered the United States, or if such aliens are held by the country from which they entered the United States not to be subjects or citizens of such country, and such country refuses to permit their reentry, or imposes any condition upon permitting reentry, then to the country of which such aliens are subjects or citizens, or to the country in which they resided prior to entering the country from which they entered the United States. If effected at any time within five years after the entry of the alien, such deportation, including one-half of the entire cost of removal to the port of deportation, shall be at the expense of the contractor, procurer, or other person by whom the alien was unlawfully induced to enter the United States, or, if that can not be done, then the cost of removal to the port of deportation shall be at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, and the deportation from such port shall be at the expense of the owner or owners of such vessels or transportation line by which such aliens respectively came, or, if that is not practicable, at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. If such deportation is effected later than five years after the entry of the alien, or, if the deportation is made by reason of causes arising subsequent to entry, the cost thereof shall be payable from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. A failure or refusal on the part of the masters, agents, owners, or consignees of vessels to comply with the order of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to take on board, guard safely, and transport to the destination specified any alien ordered to be deported under the provisions of this act shall be punished by the imposition of the penalties prescribed in section 18 of this act: Provided, That when in the opinion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the mental or physical condition of such alien is such as to require personal care and attendance, he may employ a suitable person for that purpose, who shall accompany such alien to his or her final destination, and the expense incident to such service shall be defrayed in like manner. Pending the final disposal of the case of any alien so taken into custody he may be released under a bond in the penalty of not less than $500 with security approved by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, conditioned that such alien shall be produced when required for a hearing or hearings in regard to the charge upon which he has been taken into custody, and for deportation if he shall be found to be unlawfully within the United States.

"SEC. 21. That any alien liable to be excluded because likely to become a public charge or because of physical disability other than tuberculosis in any form or a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease may, if otherwise admissible, nevertheless be admitted in the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor upon the giving of a suitable and proper bond or undertaking, approved by said Secretary, in such amount and containing such conditions as he may prescribe, to the United States and to all States, Territories, counties, towns, municipalities, and districts thereof, holding the United States and all States, Territories, counties, towns, municipalities, and districts thereof harmless against such alien becoming a public charge. The admission of such alien shall be a consideration for the giving of such bond or undertaking. Suit may be brought thereon in the name and by the proper law officers either of the United States Government or of any State, Territory, district, county, town, or municipality in which such alien becomes a public charge.

"SEC. 22. That wherever an alien shall have taken up his permanent residence in this country, and shall have filed his declaration of intention to become a citizen, and thereafter shall send for his wife or minor children to join him, if said wife or any of said children shall be found to be affected with any contagious disorder, such wife or children shall be held, under such regulations as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall prescribe, until it shall be determined whether the disorder will be easily curable or whether they can be permitted to land without danger to other persons; and they shall not be either admitted or deported until such facts have been ascertained; and if it shall be determined that the disorder is easily curable and the husband or father or other responsible person is willing to bear the expense of the treatment, they may be accorded treatment in hospital until cured and then be admitted, or if it shall be determined that they can be permitted to land without danger to other persons, they may, if otherwise admissible, thereupon be admitted.

"SEC. 23. That the Commissioner General of Immigration shall perform all his duties under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. Under such direction he shall have charge of the administration of all laws relating to the immigration of aliens into the United States, and shall have the control, direction, and supervision of all officers, clerks, and employees appointed thereunder; he shall establish such rules and regulations, prescribe such forms of bond, reports, entries, and other papers, and shall issue from time to time such instructions, not inconsistent with law, as he shall deem best calculated for carrying out the provisions of this act and for protecting the United States and aliens migrating thereto from fraud and loss, and shall have authority to enter into contract for the support and relief of such aliens as may fall into distress or need public aid, and to remove to their native country, at any time within three years after entry, at the expense of the appropriations for the enforcement of this act, such as fall into distress or need public aid from causes arising subsequent to their entry and are desirous of being so removed; he shall prescribe rules for the entry and inspection of aliens along the borders of Canada and Mexico, so as not unnecessarily to delay, impede, or annoy persons in ordinary travel between the United States and said countries, and shall have power to enter into contracts with transportation lines for the said purpose; it shall be the duty of the Commissioner General of Immigration to detail officers of the Immigration Service from time to time as may be necessary, in his judgment, to secure information as to the number of aliens detained in the penal, reformatory, and charitable institutions (public and private) of the several States and Territories, the District of Columbia, and other territory of the United States and to inform the officers of such institutions of the provisions of law in relation to the deportation of aliens who have become public charges. He may, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, whenever in his judgment such action may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of this act, detail immigration officers, and also surgeons of the United States Public Health Service employed under this act for service in foreign countries. The duties of commissioners of immigration and other immigration officials in charge of districts, ports, or stations shall be of an administrative character, to be prescribed in detail by regulations prepared under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor: Provided, That for the purpose of making effective the provisions of this section relating to the protection of aliens from fraud and loss, and also the provisions of section 30 of this act, relating to the distribution of aliens, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall establish and maintain immigrant stations at such interior places as may be necessary, and, in the discretion of the said Secretary, aliens in transit from ports of landing to such interior stations shall be accompanied by immigrant inspectors.

"SEC. 24. That immigrant inspectors and other immigration officers, clerks, and employees shall hereafter be appointed and their compensation fixed and raised or decreased from time to time by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, upon the recommendation of the Commissioner General of Immigration and in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service act of January 16, 1883: Provided, That said Secretary, in the enforcement of that portion of this act which excludes contract laborers, may employ, without reference to the provisions of the said civil-service act, or to the various acts relative to the compilation of the official register, such persons as he may deem advisable and from time to time fix, raise, or decrease their compensation. He may draw annually from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act $50,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended for the salaries and expenses of persons so employed and for expenses incident to such employment; and the accounting officers of the Treasury shall pass to the credit of the proper disbursing officer expenditures from said sum without itemized account whenever the Secretary of Commerce and Labor certifies that an itemized account would not be for the best interests of the Government: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to alter the mode of appointing commissioners of immigration at the several ports of the United States as provided by the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 18, 1894, or the official status of such commissioners heretofore appointed.

"SEC. 25. That the district courts of the United States are hereby invested with full and concurrent jurisdiction of all causes, civil and criminal, arising under any of the provisions of this act. That it shall be the duty of the United States district attorney of the proper district to prosecute every such suit when brought by the United States under this act. Such prosecutions or suits may be instituted at any place in the United States at which the violation may occur or at which the person charged with such violation may be found. That no suit or proceeding for a violation of the provisions of this act shall be settled, compromised, or discontinued without the consent of the court in which it is pending, entered of record, with the reasons therefor.

"SEC. 26. That all exclusive privileges of exchanging money, transporting passengers or baggage, or keeping eating houses, and all other like privileges in connection with any United States immigrant station, shall be disposed of after public competition, subject to such conditions and limitations as the Commissioner General of Immigration, under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, may prescribe, and all receipts accruing from the disposal of such exclusive privileges shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States. No intoxicating liquors shall be sold at any such immigrant station.

"SEC. 27. That for the preservation of the peace and in order that arrests may be made for crimes under the laws of the States and Territories of the United States where the various immigrant stations are located, the officers in charge of such stations, as occasion may require, shall admit therein the proper State and municipal officers charged with the enforcement of such laws, and for the purpose of this section the jurisdiction of such officers and of the local courts shall extend over such stations.

"SEC. 28. That any person who knowingly aids or assists any anarchist or any person who believes in or advocates the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or who disbelieves in or is opposed to organized government, or all forms of law, or who advocates the assassination of public officials, or who is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or who advocates or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character, to enter the United States, or who connives or conspires with any person or persons to allow, procure, or permit any such anarchist or person aforesaid to enter therein shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

"SEC. 29. That the President of the United States is authorized, in the name of the Government of the United States, to call, in his discretion, an international conference, to assemble at such point as may be agreed upon, or to send special commissioners to any foreign country, for the purpose of regulating by international agreement, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, the immigration of aliens to the United States; of providing for the mental, moral, and physical examination of such aliens by American consuls or other officers of the United States Government at the ports of embarkation, or elsewhere; of securing the assistance of foreign Governments in their own territories to prevent the evasion of the laws of the United States governing immigration to the United States; of entering into such international agreements as may be proper to prevent the immigration of aliens who, under the laws of the United States, are or may be excluded from entering the United States, and of regulating any matters pertaining to such immigration.

"SEC. 30. That there shall be maintained a division of information in the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization; and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall provide such clerical and other assistance as may be necessary. It shall be the duty of said division to promote a beneficial distribution of aliens admitted into the United States among the several States and Territories desiring immigration. Correspondence shall be had with the proper officials of the States and Territories, and said division shall gather from all available sources useful information regarding the resources, products, and physical characteristics of each State and Territory, and shall publish such information in different languages and distribute the publications among all admitted aliens at the immigrant stations of the United States and to such other persons as may desire the same. When any State or Territory appoints and maintains an agent or agents to represent it at any of the immigrant stations of the United States, such agents shall, under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, have access to aliens who have been admitted to the United States for the purpose of presenting, either orally or in writing, the special inducements offered by such State or Territory to aliens to settle therein. While on duty at any immigrant station such agents shall be subject to all the regulations prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, who, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, may, for violation of any such regulations, deny to the agent guilty of such violation any of the privileges herein granted.

"SEC. 31. That any person, including the owner, agent, consignee, or master of any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place, who shall knowingly sign on the ship's articles, or bring to the United States as one of the crew of such vessel, any alien, with intent to permit such alien to land in the United States in violation of the laws and treaties of the United States regulating the immigration of aliens, or who shall falsely and knowingly represent to the immigration authorities at the port of arrival that any such alien is a bona fide member of the crew, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding $5,000, for which sum the said vessel shall be liable and may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense.

"SEC. 32. That no alien excluded from admission into the United States by any law or treaty of the United States regulating the immigration of aliens, and employed on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place, shall be permitted to land in the United States, except temporarily for medical treatment, or pursuant to regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor providing for the ultimate removal or deportation of such alien from the United States, and the negligent failure of the owner, agent, consignee, or master of such vessel to detain on board any such alien after notice in writing by the immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival, and to deport such alien, if required by such immigration officer or by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, shall render such owner, agent, consignee, or master liable to a penalty not exceeding $1,000, for which sum the said vessel shall be liable, and may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense.

"SEC. 33. That it shall be unlawful and be deemed a violation of the preceding section to pay off or discharge any alien employed on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place, unless duly admitted pursuant to the laws and treaties of the United States regulating the immigration of aliens: Provided, That in case any such alien intends to reship on board any other vessel bound to any foreign port or place he shall be allowed to land for the purpose of so reshipping, and may be paid off, discharged, and permitted to remove his effects, anything in such laws or treaties or in this act to the contrary notwithstanding, provided due notice of such proposed action first be given to the principal immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival.

"SEC. 34. That any alien seaman who shall desert his vessel in a port of the United States or who shall land therein contrary to the provisions of this act shall be deemed to be unlawfully in the United States and shall, at any time within three years thereafter, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, be taken into custody and brought before a board of special inquiry for examination as to his qualifications for admission to the United States, and if not admitted said alien seaman shall be deported at the expense of the appropriation for this act as provided in section 20 of this act.

"SEC. 35. That it shall be unlawful for any vessel carrying passengers between a port of the United States and a port of a foreign country, upon arrival in the United States, to have on board employed thereon any alien afflicted with idiocy, imbecility, insanity, epilepsy, tuberculosis in any form, or a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, if it appears to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, from an examination made by a medical officer of the United States Public Health Service, and is so certified by such officer, that any such alien was so afflicted at the time he was shipped or engaged and taken on board such vessel and that the existence of such affliction might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time; and for every such alien so afflicted on board any such vessel at the time of arrival the owner, agent, consignee, or master thereof shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $25; and no vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine and while it remains unpaid: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine: Provided further, That such fine may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, be mitigated or remitted.

"SEC. 36. That upon arrival of any vessel in the United States from any foreign port or place it shall be the duty of the owner, agent, consignee, or master thereof to deliver to the principal immigration officer in charge of the port of arrival lists containing the names of all aliens employed on such vessel, stating the positions they respectively hold in the ship's company, when and where they were respectively shipped or engaged, and specifying those to be paid off and discharged in the port of arrival; or lists containing so much of such information as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall by regulation prescribe; and after the arrival of any such vessel it shall be the duty of such owner, agent, consignee, or master to report to such immigration officer, in writing, as soon as discovered, all cases in which any such alien has deserted the vessel, giving a description of such alien, together with any information likely to lead to his apprehension; and before the departure of any such vessel it shall be the duty of such owner, agent, consignee, or master to deliver to such immigration officer a further list containing the names of all alien employees who were not employed thereon at the time of the arrival, but who will leave port thereon at the time of her departure, and also the names of those, if any, who have been paid off and discharged, and of those, if any, who have deserted or landed or been duly admitted; and in case of the failure of such owner, agent, consignee, or master so to deliver either of the said lists of such aliens arriving and departing, respectively, or so to report such cases of desertion, or landing, such owner, agent, consignee, or master shall, if required by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $10 for each alien concerning whom correct lists are not delivered or a true report is not made as above required; and no such vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine and, in the event such fine is imposed, while it remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine.

"SEC. 37. The word 'person' as used in this act shall be construed to import both the plural and the singular, as the case may be, and shall include corporations, companies, and associations. When construing and enforcing the provisions of this act, the act, omission, or failure of any director, officer, agent, or employee of any corporation, company, or association acting within the scope of his employment or office shall in every case be deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such corporation, company, or association, as well as that of the person acting for or in behalf of such corporation, company, or association.

"SEC. 38. That this act, except as otherwise provided in section 3, shall take effect and be enforced from and after July 1, 1913. The act of March 26, 1910, amending the act of February 20, 1907, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States; the act of February 20, 1907, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, except section 34 thereof; the act of March 3, 1903, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, except section 34 thereof; and all other acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed on and after the taking effect of this act: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to repeal, alter, or amend existing laws relating to the immigration or exclusion of Chinese persons or persons of Chinese descent, nor to repeal, alter, or amend section 6, chapter 453, third session Fifty-eighth Congress, approved February 6, 1905, or the act approved August 2, 1882, entitled 'An act to regulate the carriage of passengers by sea,' and amendments thereto: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to affect any prosecution, suit, action, or proceedings brought, or any act, thing, or matter, civil or criminal, done or existing at the time of the taking effect of this act, except as mentioned in the last proviso of section 19 hereof; but as to all such prosecutions, suits, actions, proceedings, acts, things, or matters, the laws or parts of laws repealed or amended by this act are hereby continued in force and effect."

JOHN L. BURNETT,
AUGUSTUS P. GARDNER,
Managers on the part of the House.
H. C. LODGE,
WM. P. DILLINGHAM,
LE ROY PERCY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the Senate bill (S. 3175) regulating the immigration of aliens submit the following detailed statement in explanation of the effect agreed upon and recommended in the conference report:

The changes made since the last conference report was accepted by the House on January 25 are as follows:

First. The change made in the definition of the word "alien" during the second conference has been modified.

Second. In section 3 the following clause has been stricken out: "persons who have committed a felony or other crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude." In lieu thereof has been reinserted the provision of existing law, viz, "persons who have been convicted of or admit having committed a felony or other crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude."

JOHN L. BURNETT,
AUGUSTUS P. GARDNER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, the main thing I desire to call the attention of the House to is in regard to Asiatic immigration, and particularly to the Chinese, Hindu, and Japanese immigration, as it relates to this bill. Also to the provision in the bill which is somewhat of a substitute—and I use the word advisedly—as to excluding persons ineligible to become citizens of the United States by naturalization.

The bill as it was originally introduced did not contain any questions as to Chinese, and the bill provided that all laws relating to the exclusion of Chinese persons should be repealed. The original bill as prepared by the committee contained a provision that "persons who are ineligible to become citizens of the United States for naturalization." Then the bill as presented on August 7, 1911, S. 3175, contained the provision, "persons who are not eligible to become citizens of the United States by naturalization. This provision shall not apply to persons of the following status or occupation."

Then, the bill as amended January 18, 1912, contained this provision: "Persons who are not eligible to become citizens of the United States by naturalization," with the same provision that it shall not apply to persons of the following status or occupation, which is there specified.

On February 14, 1912, Senate bill 3175 was recommitted to the Committee on Immigration of the Senate, and contained, in addition to the above, "Provided, That persons who are not eligible to become citizens of the United States by naturalization, unless otherwise provided for by treaties, conventions, or by agreement or passport." That provision, in substance, was in the bill as prepared by the committee at the first draft of it. On August 7, 1911, February 18, 1912, February 14, 1912, and as reintroduced April 15, 1912, and as reintroduced and passed the Senate April 19, 1912, and as submitted to the House, the entire matter was stricken out, and the Burnett amendment substituted therefor. The three conference reports, 1340, 1378, and 1410 contain the same provision as was in the original bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to insert the statement in the RECORD as a part of his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

Provisions of the bill relating to persons who are not eligible to become citizens of the United States by naturalization, Senate bill 3175, as prepared by the committee of the Senate, per Senator DILLINGHAM, the bill originally containing the following provisions:

1. In lines 15 to 25, both inclusive, page 11, and lines 1 to 5, page 12, are the following:

"Persons who are not eligible to become citizens of the United States by naturalization. This provision, however, shall not apply to persons of the following status or occupations: Government officers, ministers or religious teachers, missionaries, lawyers, physicians, chemists, engineers, teachers, students, authors, editors, journalists, merchants, bankers, capitalists, and travelers for curiosity or pleasure, nor to their legal wives or their children under 16 years of age who shall accompany them or who subsequently may apply for admission to the United States; but such persons or their legal wives or foreign-born children who fail to maintain in the United States a status or occupation placing them within the accepted classes shall be deemed to be in the United States contrary to law and shall be subject to deportation as provided in section 20 of this act."

2. On August 7, 1911, Senate 3175, a bill to regulate the immigration of aliens into and the residence of aliens in the United States, was introduced by Senator DILLINGHAM, read twice, and referred to the Committee on Immigration. This bill as thus introduced contained the following provisions, which will be found in lines 20 to 25, page 7, and lines 1 to 10, page 8, under section 3, as follows:

"Persons who are not eligible to become citizens of the United States by naturalization. This provision, however, shall not apply to persons of the following status or occupations: Government officers, ministers or religious teachers, missionaries, lawyers, physicians, chemists, engineers, teachers, students, authors, editors, journalists, merchants, bankers, capitalists, and travelers for curiosity or pleasure, nor to their legal wives or their children under 16 years of age who shall accompany them or who subsequently may apply for admission to the United States; but such persons or their legal wives or foreign-born children who fail to maintain in the United States a status or occupation placing them within the accepted classes shall be deemed to be in the United States contrary to law and shall be subject to deportation as provided in section 20 of this act."

3. On January 18, 1912, the bill was reported by Mr. LODGE, calendar No. 190, which contains the following provisions therein in section 3, lines 2 to 20, page 8 thereof, as follows:

"Persons who are not eligible to become citizens of the United States by naturalization. The foregoing provision, however, shall not apply to persons of the following status or occupations: Government officers, ministers or religious teachers, missionaries, lawyers, physicians, chemists, engineers, teachers, students, authors, editors, journalists, merchants, bankers, capitalists, and travelers for curiosity or pleasure, nor to their legal wives or their children under 16 years of age who shall accompany them or who subsequently may apply for admission to the United States, but such persons or their legal wives or foreign-born children who fail to maintain in the United States a status or occupation placing them within the excepted classes, shall be deemed to be in the United States contrary to law, and shall be subject to deportation as provided in section 20 of this act."

4. On February 14, 1912, Senate bill 3175 was recommitted to the Committee on Immigration and reported the same day by Mr. LODGE from the committee. In section 3, on lines 1 to 21, page 8, will be found the following, namely:

"Persons who are not eligible to become citizens of the United States by naturalization, unless otherwise provided for by treaties, conventions, or by agreements or passports. The foregoing provision, however, shall not apply to persons of the following status or occupations: Government officers, ministers or religious teachers, missionaries, lawyers, physicians, chemists, engineers, teachers, students, authors, editors, journalists, merchants, bankers, capitalists, and travelers for curiosity and pleasure, nor to their legal wives or their children under 16 years of age who shall accompany them or who subsequently may apply for admission to the United States, but such persons or their legal wives or foreign-born children who fail to maintain in the United States a status or occupation placing them within the excepted classes, shall be deemed to be in the United States contrary to law, and shall be subject to deportation as provided in section 20 of this act."

5. On April 15, 1912, Senate bill 3175, was ordered printed by the Senate, which was done, and in section 3, lines 11 to 25, page 8, and lines 1 to 6, page 9, it contains the following, namely:

"Persons who are not eligible to become citizens of the United States by naturalization, unless otherwise excluded by existing agreements as to passports, or by treaties, conventions, or agreements that may hereafter be entered into. The two provisions next foregoing, however, shall not apply to persons of the following status or occupations: Government officers, ministers or religious teachers, missionaries, lawyers, physicians, chemists, engineers, teachers, students, authors, editors, journalists, merchants, bankers, capitalists, and travelers for curiosity or pleasure, nor to their legal wives or their children under 16 years of age who shall accompany them or who subsequently may apply for admission to the United States, but such persons or their legal wives or foreign-born children who fail to maintain in the United States a status or occupation placing them within the excepted classes, shall be deemed to be in the United States contrary to law, and shall be subject to deportation as provided in section 20 of this act."

6. On April 19, 1912, Senate bill 3175 passed the Senate, and in section 3, lines 7 to 25, page 8, contains the following, namely:

"Persons who are not eligible to become citizens of the United States by naturalization, unless otherwise provided for by existing agreements as to passports, or by treaties, conventions, or agreements that may hereafter be entered into. The two provisions next foregoing, however, shall not apply to persons of the following status or occupations: Government officers, ministers or religious teachers, missionaries, lawyers, physicians, chemists, engineers, teachers, students, authors, editors, journalists, merchants, bankers, and travelers for curiosity or pleasure, nor to their legal wives or their children under 16 years of age who shall accompany them or who subsequently may apply for admission to the United States, but such persons or their legal wives or foreign-born children who fail to maintain in the United States a status or occupation placing them within the excepted classes shall be deemed to be in the United States contrary to law and shall be subject to deportation as provided in section 20 of this act."

7. On April 20, 1912, Senate bill 3175 was reported to the House of Representatives and referred to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization and contained the same provisions identical with that specified above.

8. On June 7, 1912, the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization of the House reported Senate bill 3175, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in substance what is known as the Burnett bill.

9. Senate bill 3175 passed the House of Representatives on the 18th day of December, 1912, which adopted the Burnett amendment which struck out all of the Dillingham bill after the enacting clause and substituted the Burnett bill therefor, which substitute is as follows:

"That after four months from the approval of this act, in addition to the aliens who are by law now excluded from admission into the United States the following persons shall also be excluded from admission thereto, to wit: All aliens over 16 years of age, physically capable of reading, who can not read the English language, or the language or dialect of some other country, including Hebrew or Yiddish: Provided, That any admissible alien or any alien heretofore or hereafter legally admitted or any citizen of the United States may bring in or send for his father or grandfather over 55 years of age, his wife, his mother, his grandmother, or his unmarried or widowed daughter, if otherwise admissible, whether such relative can read or not; and such relatives shall be permitted to land.

"SEC. 2. That for the purpose of ascertaining whether aliens can read or not the immigrant inspectors shall be furnished with copies of uniform slips, prepared under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, each containing not less than 30 nor more than 40 words in ordinary use, printed in plain type in the various languages and dialects of immigrants. Each alien may designate the particular language or dialect in which he desires the examination to be made, and shall be required to read the words printed on the slip in such language or dialect. No two aliens coming in the same vessel or other vehicle of carriage or transportation shall be tested with the same slip.

"SEC. 3. That the following classes of persons shall be exempt from the operation of this act, to wit: (a) All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that they are seeking admission to the United States solely for the purpose of escaping from religious persecution; (b) all aliens in transit through the United States; (c) all aliens who have been lawfully admitted to the United States and who later shall go in transit from one part of the United States to another through foreign contiguous territory.

"SEC. 4. That an alien refused admission to the United States under the provisions of this act shall be sent back to the country whence he came in the manner provided by section 19 of 'An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States,' approved February 20, 1907."

10. There were three conference reports filed from the conferees. The first was Report No. 1340, presented January 16, 1913, which report contained the following provision on pages 3 and 4 thereof, as follows: "Persons who can not become eligible, under existing law, to become citizens of the United States by naturalization, unless otherwise provided for by existing agreements as to passports, or by treaties, conventions, or agreements that may hereafter be entered into. The provision next foregoing, however, shall not apply to persons of the following status or occupations: Government officers, ministers or religious teachers, missionaries, lawyers, physicians, chemists, engineers, teachers, students, authors, editors, journalists, merchants, bankers, and travelers for curiosity or pleasure, nor to their legal wives or their children under 16 years of age who shall accompany them or who subsequently may apply for admission to the United States, but such persons or their legal wives or foreign-born children who fail to maintain in the United States a status or occupation placing them within the excepted classes shall be deemed to be in the United States contrary to law, and shall be subject to deportation as provided in section 19 of this act."

11. The second report of the conferees was filed January 23, 1913, Report No. 1378, to accompany S. 3175, which conference report, No. 1378, on pages 3 and 4 thereof, contained the following, namely:

"Persons who can not become eligible, under existing law, to become citizens of the United States by naturalization, unless otherwise provided for by existing agreements as to passports, or by treaties, conventions, or agreements that may hereafter be entered into. The provision next foregoing, however, shall not apply to persons of the following status or occupations: Government officers, ministers or religious teachers, missionaries, lawyers, physicians, chemists, engineers, teachers, students, authors, editors, journalists, merchants, bankers, and travelers for curiosity or pleasure, nor to their legal wives or their children under 16 years of age who shall accompany them or who subsequently may apply for admission to the United States, but such persons or their legal wives or foreign-born children who fail to maintain in the United States a status or occupation placing them within the excepted classes shall be deemed to be in the United States contrary to law, and shall be subject to deportation as provided in section 19 of this act.

12. The third report of the conferees on Senate bill 3175 was presented January 28, 1913, and is No. 1410, and on pages 3 and 4 thereof contains the following, namely:

"Persons who can not become eligible, under existing law, to become citizens of the United States by naturalization, unless otherwise provided for by existing agreements as to passports, or by treaties, conventions, or agreements that may hereafter be entered into. The provision next foregoing, however, shall not apply to persons of the following status or occupations: Government officers, ministers or religious teachers, missionaries, lawyers, physicians, chemists, engineers, teachers, students, authors, editors, journalists, merchants, bankers, and travelers for curiosity or pleasure, nor to their legal wives or their children under 16 years of age who shall accompany them or who subsequently may apply for admission to the United States, but such persons or their legal wives or foreign-born children who fail to maintain in the United States a status or occupation placing them within the excepted classes shall be deemed to be in the United States contrary to law, and shall be subject to deportation as provided in section 19 of this act."

It will be seen from the above that in substance the provisions above referred to have been carried out in the preparation and introduction of the Dillingham bill, S. 3175, through its preparation and progress in the Senate and in the House and from the conferees practically the same. In other words, no change was made by the conferees of the original provisions as it actually passed the Senate.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, the real object and intent and the promise was that there should be real exclusion of Asiatic laborers. This bill is not within the terms of the promise, and the gentleman's agreement is not within the purview of the Constitution, that the President of the United States should agree with a foreign power that a foreign magistrate should designate the qualifications of men who should come to this country. If the committee desire to have a real illiteracy test, so far as it applies to the Hindus and to those others of Asia, they should have placed in that conference the amendment offered in relation to excluding those who are unable to read any European language, the same as is the law now in Cape Colony and Australia. It then would have been effective, and it would not have been this provision, which simply leaves it not to the Government of the United States to determine but to some foreign prince or governor, or whatever may be his title, to determine whom he shall allow to come to this country. Instead of having a real exclusion bill, which will exclude those who should not become a part and parcel of the country, we have this bill, which will exclude a few, but it does not cover the idea of those in the West, who have been believing that this Congress would give them a real exclusion bill, as they have been demanding for so many years and as has been actually promised. While I shall vote for this conference report, it is not my idea as to what the law should be.

So far as the Chinese are concerned, in respect to the question of illiteracy, there are only 6 per cent of Chinese who can not read and write who have come to this country, and but a small percentage of the others; so, as a matter of fact, the real purpose of the bill is not accomplished. It tends somewhat in that direction, but I do not believe the people should be dealt with in a way to leave any question about the matter when the provisions of the bill can be made so plain and so clear in its language as to carry out the real desire of the public—entire exclusion of all Asiatic laborers.

SENATE BILL 3175 AS IT RELATES TO CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Senate bill 3175, as prepared by the committee of the Senate, per Senator DILLINGHAM, upon the subject of Chinese immigration, contained the following provisions:

1. On page 70, lines 2 to 6, is as follows:

"All laws relating to the exclusion of Chinese persons or persons of Chinese descent, except such provisions thereof as may relate to the naturalization of aliens, and all other acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act, are hereby repealed on and after the taking effect of this act."

2. Senate bill 3175, as introduced on August 7, 1911, in the Senate, contained the following provision, found on page 55, lines 21 to 23:

"All laws relating to the exclusion of Chinese persons or persons of Chinese descent, except such provisions thereof as may relate to the naturalization of aliens, and all other acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act, are hereby repealed on and after the taking effect of this act."

3. Senate bill 3175, as introduced on January 18, 1912, reported by Mr. LODGE with amendments, in lines 11 to 17, page 62, contained the same provisions as above specified.

4. Senate bill 3175, reported on February 14, 1912, was on the same day recommitted to the Committee on Immigration, and was on the same day reported by Mr. LODGE with amendments, and the same provisions as above specified were contained in the bill, lines 11 to 17, page 62.

5. Said bill was, on April 15, 1910, ordered to be reprinted as amended, and the following provisions are found therein. Lines 8 to 11, page 8, contain the following:

"Chinese persons or persons of Chinese descent, whether subjects of China or subjects or citizens of any other country foreign to the United States." And on page 63, lines 17 to 23 thereof, is found the following: "All laws relating to the exclusion of Chinese persons or persons of Chinese descent, except such provisions thereof as may relate to the naturalization of aliens, and except as provided in section 3 of this act; and all other acts are hereby repealed on and after the taking effect of this act."

6. On April 19, 1912, Senate bill 3175 passed the Senate and was reported to the House on April 20, 1912, which contained the following provisions, lines 5 to 7, on page 8, as follows:

"Chinese persons or persons of Chinese descent, whether subjects of China or subjects or citizens of any other country foreign to the United States." And on lines 19 to 24, page 57, is found the following provisions: "All laws relating to the exclusion of Chinese persons or persons of Chinese descent, except such provisions thereof as may relate to the naturalization of aliens, excepting as provided in section 3 of this act, are hereby repealed on and after the taking effect of this act."

7. The bill was considered by the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization and reported to the House on June 9, 1910, which struck out all of the bill except the enacting clause and inserted what is known as the Burnett amendment, which is found on pages 58, 59, and 60 of the bill thus reported.

8. S. 3175 went to conference, and the first conference report (No. 1340) in substance adopted the Dillingham bill as it passed the Senate, with the Burnett amendment as it passed the House, and on page 24 contains the following provision:

"Provided, That this act shall not be construed to repeal, alter, or amend existing laws relating to the immigration or exclusion of Chinese persons or persons of Chinese descent."

9. The second conference report (No. 1378) of the conference on S. 3175 contained the same provisions as specified in conference report No. 1340, in so far as it relates to Chinese immigration.

10. Conference report No. 1410, the report of January 28, 1913, to the House contained the same provisions relative to Chinese immigration as the first and second reports of the conference committee of both Houses.

Had the bill as passed the Senate become the law, the Chinese-exclusion bill would undoubtedly have been repealed. With the provisions of section 3 of the bill stricken out and the provision of the conference reports included as last above set out, the Chinese-exclusion law will still remain in full force and effect.

With the enactment of H. R. 13500 this repeal question would be fully and finally settled as it ought and should be. Without doubt this bill, H. R. 13500, will be enacted into law in the near future. It will make exclusion of all Asiatic laborers effective and provide proper machinery for its full enforcement.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. RAKER was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is said that the third time is a charm—three times and out. This is the third conference report on this bill. It is to be hoped that if it passes the House it will also pass the scrutiny of the conferees who have made it, and also of the Senate. I believe the conferees who have made the report have agreed substantially that the two former reports need to be corrected. It is an illustration of the effect of the rule which was adopted by the House.

The Senate passed an immigration bill consisting of nearly 60 pages, with a great many sections in it. The House committee reported that bill to the House with the recommendation that all the bill after the enacting clause be stricken out and one section be inserted, which was a part of one section of the original Senate bill with some changes in it. If the House had had an opportunity to consider the original Senate bill, section by section, these various changes which have been made in the conference report, one after another, would probably never have had to be made in the conference report, because they would have been called to the attention of the conferees. But under this method of legislation the matter is not brought up before the House, and evidently gentlemen who represent the House are not familiar with the provisions of the Senate bill, and have agreed to propositions in conference which subsequently they have come in and proposed to change. In the second conference report there was inserted a provision consisting of a description of an alien which was not in the first conference, and in the third conference report that description is left out, leaving it as it was in the first conference report, and they have inserted an item in some other place in the bill.

No one can expect that we will secure perfect legislation by putting through the House a Senate bill with many sections in it, 50 or 60 pages long, without any consideration by the House, leaving it wholly to the conferees to write the bill. We have heard a great deal at different times about the decadence of the power of the House as one of the coordinate branches of Congress. There is nothing which tends to bring on such decadence or to prove that such decadence exists so much as this method of legislation.

We ought to have considered the provisions in the Senate bill; there ought to have been opportunity in the House for Members to discuss the provisions in the Senate bill, and then we would not have had three conference reports, nor would we be called upon, as we will be called upon, to enact measures in the future to correct many of the errors now in this conference report, provisions which would not be in the law if the House had had the opportunity to consider it. A bill that passed the Senate practically with little discussion, passed the House without any discussion or consideration of most of the provisions in it, can not expect to be a very perfect measure. [Applause.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, one minute, if the gentleman will yield to me to use some of my time now.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Certainly, with Mr. MOORE'S consent.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is quite right in calling the attention of the House to the singular fact that for the third time this conference report is under consideration. He is wrong, however, in attributing this phenomenon to the rule under which this bill was originally considered. The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that the situation in which we find ourselves is a noteworthy illustration of the evils of filibustering. Had gentlemen last summer refrained from filibustering against the call of the Committee on Immigration on Calendar Wednesday, the conferees would have had all these matters fresh in their minds. Had not the desire existed to postpone action until after election, it would not have proved necessary to bring this report three times before the House. Now, to speak seriously for a moment, I think the gentleman is wrong in supposing that there will be a great deal of legislation required to correct the mistakes in this conference report.

The fact is that this bill has been under the scrutiny of many of the sharpest-eyed lawyers of this country, both in and out of Congress. They have discovered mistakes, which we admit, errors and contradictions which would sooner or later reveal themselves and perhaps require court interpretation. Mr. Speaker, that is true of all codifications of this sort. It occurred in the case of the last codification of the immigration law. The only difference in the situation arises from the close scrutiny to which this bill has been submitted by many able lawyers in New York and elsewhere. The mistakes have been found out before the law has been sent to the President for his signature rather than afterwards.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the real objection I have to this legislation arises from the insertion in it of the illiteracy test, which I believe to be un-American and an unjust restriction upon the worthy poor who desire to come to the United States, and I do strenuously object to the manner in which this legislation is brought into the House. The House itself discussed only the question of the illiteracy test, and that under very limited conditions as to time of debate. It did not discuss the so-called Dillingham bill at all. That bill, which constitutes the major portion of the legislation now proposed, originated in conference, and the House had no opportunity whatever to dissect it, to analyze it, or thoroughly consider it. The practice has arisen——

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I regret I can not yield; I have but three minutes, and I guess about a minute and a half of that is gone.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the practice has arisen here in recent years, surely since I have been a Member of the House, of instituting new legislation in conference. Now, what does that mean? It means that the representatives of the people, coming from various districts throughout the country, are thrown absolutely upon the mercy of a majority of six men in star chamber. In the closet, outside, wherever they may meet, they decide as to the matters we are to put through this House. The difficulty with this conference report is that it has not been considered as it ought to be by a deliberative body; it has been considered only in star chamber and has been rushed through the House on each occasion that it has appeared here. In the present instance it comes back because certain errors or imperfections were found in the bill upon the other side of the House where they had a chance to consider it, but we are supposed to rush it through here in 40 minutes without again having an opportunity to consider the merits of the vital questions involved. Whose judgment are we to take in matters of this kind? Are we to respond to the wishes of the people who send us here, or are we to yield in the last analysis to the six men, in this instance five men, who constitute the conferees and who prepared this report and brought it into the House?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] use some of his time?

Mr. BURNETT. How much time have we?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has seven minutes left.

Mr. BURNETT. I have no further request for time.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, when this 24-page conference report on the immigration bill, comprising 38 sections, came up first on the 17th of this month, I read my copy of it from the beginning until I reached section 3, which names the classes of aliens who could not be allowed to enter this country, and found that among those who were to be excluded would be—

Citizens or subjects of any country that issues penal certificates or certificates of character who do not produce to the immigration officials such a certificate.

I read no further, but with a lead pencil underscored the words I have just read, and pointing them out to several Members in my vicinity announced that it was immaterial what the rest of the report might be, those words were sufficient for me, and that I should vote against it. I have in my hand the copy I had that day.

The report passed the House and went to the Senate, but came back here a few days ago, with a request for another conference, which was granted. To-day we are considering the third conference report.

The reason for having a third conference is found in the statement of the Senator who asked for it. He declared in the Senate, on January 23, that it had been discovered after examination that the provisions of the report as adopted by the House were so transposed as to nullify the deportation clause in the cases of the white-slave traffic and also in cases of disease or crime—in other words, that the House had in effect voted to repeal the clause of the law under which we now send back criminals, diseased persons, and managers of the infamous traffic in white slaves.

That report was rushed through here too rapidly for proper consideration. Mr. Speaker, the haste with which the House of Representatives too often attempts to enact legislation of importance is altogether wrong. There ought to be deliberation and opportunity for the study of an important conference report in order to enable each Member of the House for himself to decide whether it does or does not appeal to his judgment as being worthy of support. But we have no such opportunity when a report of 24 pages is brought in and passed after a debate of only a few minutes on a side. For years I have been protesting against that sort of thing, and I shall continue so to protest while I am honored by a seat in this Chamber.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER].

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, I can only say, in connection with what I have already said about this bill now before the House, that I believe that this proposition to restrict immigration is un-American, that it is unwise, and unfair. And the very fact that this bill has been before this House three times shows conclusively that in its original form and as it passed on two former occasions it was ill considered, that it was not proper legislation, and that the other body in the other end of the Capitol would not agree to the bill as passed. And I mistake the times and public opinion in this country considerably if there is not a protest from one end of the country to the other against this class of legislation. I do not believe that conditions in this country warrant it. I do not believe that conditions confronting the American people require any such legislation. In fact, I know if this law goes into force you will hear a howl from one end of this broad land to the other against such a bill, because the business interests, conditions in the farming communities, and the necessity in this country for the class of labor you propose to exclude will be such that everybody voting for it will hear as a result of that vote a protest against this class of legislation.

I do not wish to be misunderstood in the attitude I assume with relation to the immigration question. I will concede that the laws affecting immigration are not perfect. Evils do result from their enforcement and application. But the committee having this legislation in charge failed entirely in recognizing the real weakness of the whole scheme of immigrant legislation. The evils flowing from our immigration laws require for their correction not restrictive, repressive, or prohibitive laws, but, on the contrary, laws that will provide for the proper distribution of the immigrants in order to avoid congestion in our large cities and in order that assimilation can be more effectively accomplished and the country generally benefited by this immigration.

These reforms can not be effected by the application of the literacy test. The western and southern sections of the country require an influx of white settlers for the development of their vast natural resources, which for lack of such labor are in a deplorable condition of stagnation. And it is astonishing in the face of the existence of this necessity to find such persistent activity among the Representatives of these sections in opposition to a liberal policy affecting immigration.

You can not legislate morality into a people. Moral stamina is the result of long and gradual development under the beneficent influence of an advanced civilization. The literacy test alone will not accomplish this. The educated crook, the intellectual swindler, the confirmed anarchist, all can comply with this so-called literacy test and find admission to our shores. While the honest, hard-working, industrious, and God-fearing person suffering from conditions of illiteracy for which he is no way responsible, and under which it has been his unhappy fate to be born, would, under the operation of this test, be excluded from the blessings of our free institutions.

The fallacy and utter groundlessness of the extravagant claims made by the advocates of this test as an instrumentality in the betterment of conditions of the country socially, commercially, and politically is conclusively shown by a very strong editorial which appeared recently in the Boston Morning Herald, and which reads as follows:

ILLITERACY AND IMMIGRATION.

One honest hard-working illiterate, who lives clean and raises a decent family, is worth a hundred of the inefficients our schools turn out annually, who can read and write, but who are too fine to work and who are utterly useless in the civilization they live in. We place too high an estimate upon mere literacy; but if we paid more attention to teaching children that morality which comprehends respect for parents and law and the necessity of earning bread by the sweat of their face, we would not be troubled so much with the envy and discontent which are the outgrowth of laziness and inefficiency.

The literacy test for the exclusion of immigrants is the sheerest humbug; had such a law been in force since the early seventeenth century America would still be a howling wilderness. The American troubles of the twentieth century are not the fruits of illiteracy and immigration; they are made right here on the soil by those born on the soil, by the lazy, the inefficient, the envious, the unsuccessful—all the products of our public schools. Go to your prisons sometime and learn how many of the inmates are illiterates. When literacy has become a synonym for sanity, honesty, industry, and physical soundness it will be time enough to make illiteracy a barrier for admission to the Republic. I would rather have an illiterate who can steer a plow, wield a sledge, roof a house, lay brick, or dig a good sewer than a dozen half-baked chaps who can write dog and read cat and who are willing to live on the labor of a father and mother. Let Congress face the question fairly and let the Government back up the immigration authorities in enforcing the laws we have. The illiterate test is pure punk, just plain flapdoodle. (Boston (Mass.) Morning Herald, June 3, 1912.)

The greatest danger to our country and its standards comes not from without but from within. Every immigrant coming to our shores comes with the love of freedom in his heart to improve his condition and to enjoy the blessings of liberty and free government. We should welcome him not as a subject of suspicion but as a prospective citizen worthy of our confidence and encouragement. The love of liberty in the American heart has been its most priceless treasure, bestowed in a spirit of patriotism and nationality, and let its benign influence pervade the native and the immigrant alike, leading all in one common aspiration to higher, nobler, and grander ideals of national greatness.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] has eight minutes and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] seven minutes remaining.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I have so often expressed, during the several debates we have had on immigration, my opposition to the literacy test that I shall not attempt now to reiterate what I have heretofore said.

But I do wish to call the attention of the House particularly this morning to the fact that while, under this bill, a daughter who may be illiterate can come in with her parents or follow her parents and join them here, a son, say, a few days over 16 years of age who may be illiterate within the meaning of the bill will be kept out. Thus there will be worked a separation of the family. Would any gentleman in this House, with kindness in his heart and fairness in his mind, be willing to have such a condition? Such a separation, in my opinion, is a cruelty which ought not to find place in American legislation.

It was asserted in the other body, at the other end of the Capitol, that such a hardship as I indicated just now would be worked under the bill if it is enacted into law. I can not conceive of a greater hardship—nay, of a greater inhuman act—to a father or mother than to be compelled to leave behind him or her their boy who has been, under the laws of the foreign country, unfortunately denied opportunity for education; a boy, say, but a few days over 16 years, is to be excluded, while the rest of the family, females, may be admitted. Yet if this bill becomes a law such would be the deplorable situation in many and many a case.

While some gentlemen on the Committee on Immigration of this House have talked so much about their desire not to allow unnecessary separation of families and have professed in words deep solicitude for keeping families together as a matter of common humanity, yet some of these same gentlemen—two of them members of the conference committee—would work the hardship that I have pointed out.

The illiteracy test, as has been so often stated, and as we reiterate this morning, is neither a test of fitness nor of character. The conditions of the country do not require that such test shall be imposed. I am willing to go any length that can be devised by any man in this House to keep out the criminal, the evil-minded, the vicious, the pauper, and the insane. I would not allow any of that class to come within the United States, nor would I give them one single inch of ground to dwell on. But the healthy in mind and in body, those who are capable of self-support, those who come here willing to abide in peace and within the law amongst us and aid by their contribution of mind and thrift and energy to the proper upbuilding of the communities in which they would dwell and who are otherwise admissible under the provisions of existing law I would not forbid entrance to our land.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for one question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. For a question; certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact, frequently stated during this controversy, that anarchists, murderers, criminals, the insane, and otherwise undesirable are already excluded by existing law?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Yes; and if we enforce the existing law as it was intended it should be enforced, you will have ample protection to the country. If we need more legislation to keep out anyone that is evil-minded, vicious, or criminal, I stand here ready to vote for such legislation. But I would not pass such legislation as is now proposed, which is un-American in principle, may operate harshly, and is unnecessary and uncalled for by the existing conditions of the country. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I will reply to the criticisms of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] of the provision that he objected to on account of its not being broad enough. I will say that among those excluded are persons who can not become eligible under existing law to become citizens of the United States by naturalization unless otherwise provided by existing agreements as to passports, or by treaties, conventions, and so forth.

As I understand, the objection of the gentleman is because it does not go far enough by making exceptions of those who come in under passport agreements, and because he says the Japanese coolies are not being kept out. That clause is for the purpose of keeping out the Hindus, who are coming in and becoming a menace to the West.

I want to call attention to the fact that more Japanese are to-day going out than are coming into the United States. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, 2,508 Japanese were admitted and 5,204 departed, making 2,426 more who went out than came in. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, there were 4,282 who came in and 5,869 who went out, making 1,487 more who went out than came in. That passport law is being enforced. The Japanese are being kept out, and the purpose of this bill was to keep out new immigration that is coming in on the Pacific coast.

Mr. Speaker, in regard to the protest that gentlemen have made against adopting conference reports of this kind, the same argument might be made against any conference report.

I have never heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who is always on his feet when river and harbor appropriations are coming in, make any protest that river and harbor bills contain hundreds of items frequently that are put in by conference committees. Other gentlemen who have protested to-day have sat here dumb as oysters when conference reports involving millions of dollars have been involved. And yet when we get this immigration bill here they make a great outcry about the little consideration given to conference reports, and it seems to me they make this protest for the purpose of squaring themselves with somebody.

Mr. Speaker, my good friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE], standing like Father Abraham, at least in splendid physical appearance if in nothing else, a grand patriarch of his people and of his party, has shed crocodile tears here over the boy 16½ years old who might be excluded. We had to draw the line somewhere, Mr. Speaker. He says there would be a separation of families. Yet where the father or the mother can read, is it probable that the boy who is past 16 years of age would not himself learn to read?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Is it not a fact that the father, if he be over the age specified in the bill, may come in, though he be illiterate?

Mr. BURNETT. The father, if he is 55 years old, may come in, although he may be illiterate.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. And then the boy could be kept out if he is 16¼ years old.

Mr. BURNETT. Possibly there might be a few isolated cases of that kind, but a man over 55 years of age ought not to have any children as young as 16. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does the gentleman think men ordinarily stop becoming fathers after they are 39?

Mr. BURNETT. I am just past 55 a few years, and I became a grandfather day before yesterday. [Applause.]

But seriously this was the reason why we had to draw some kind of a line. The Immigration Commission in making their report stated that one of the main reasons that induced them to recommend the illiteracy test was because too much unskilled labor is coming to this country. Now, the boy from Europe coming over here, who is over 16 years of age, is of that age when he comes in competition with unskilled labor. The unmarried or widowed daughter is let in for the purpose of encouraging the bringing in of wives and daughters. Many of these undesirables do not bring their families, and we wanted to encourage the women to come; and for the further reason, that we believe the widowed or single daughter is more likely to be a dependent of the father than is the boy who is between 16 and 21 years of age.

Gentlemen like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] inveigh against the danger of legislation by conference committees, and yet every one of them admits that there are many wise provisions in the conference report, and each time come back with their principal attack on the illiteracy test, just as they have been doing for years.

They pretend that it is an attack on all foreigners, and yet they—every one—know that the Jews and the people from northwestern Europe will not be affected by it. Many intelligent foreigners refuse to make themselves parties to any such fallacies and repudiate the men who advance them.

I give the following example, printed in the Brooklyn Daily Eagle of December 12, 1912:

WOULD STIFFEN SULZER ON ILLITERACY BILL—MR. DWYER FEARS CONGRESSMAN IS AGAINST MEASURE.

Following is a copy of a letter sent to Governor Elect Sulzer by Edward Dwyer, of Bay Ridge:

DEAR SIR: I have been rather surprised to notice statements in the columns of the daily papers to the effect that you were opposed to the enactment into law of Senate bill No. 3175, drawn up by Mr. DILLINGHAM, which provides an illiteracy test for immigrants desiring to land on our shores. Inasmuch as this bill was passed by the Senate last April, and it is a well-known fact that the leaders of the Democratic House of Representatives agreed to have it considered in December, it seems odd to other members of the organization with which I am connected, as well as myself, that you should be so active in opposing a measure that is needed to protect the American workingman.

As a supporter of the Democratic Party in the Nation and State, I had imagined that there could not be any of the leaders who would take the stand the newspaper reports indicate that you have taken. During the campaign just ended you never referred to this immigration question, and if it was even hinted that you were opposed to restrictive legislation it would have cost you many votes, and your stand would seriously injure your chances for reelection two years hence.

The American people, native as well as foreign born, are becoming thoroughly aroused over the lax immigration laws that permit tens of thousands of undesirables to enter this country annually, a class which does not understand, nor care to learn, anything concerning American institutions. They are willing to labor for a wage that no American citizen can exist on. These people are content to live on filth, can keep body and soul together on the sort of food that would soon kill off the native-born American, the Irishman, German, Englishman, or Scandinavian.

What we are entitled to in this great country is a chance to live decently, to rear our children up good Americans, and to be enabled to save a little money for the rainy day. How can we carry out this program when in every occupation of life we have to compete with foreigners whose only aim is to gather enough money to bring them back to their native land and to live in ease for some time?

It has been shown, as you well know, that almost 40 per cent of the immigrants arriving here annually leave the country. Speak to men who have worked for large railroads and they will tell you of the same crowd of foreigners that they have observed, working for a few months on a railroad, returning to Europe with the money earned, and repeating the thing every year. A large percentage of those who stay are not a credit to any land. In New York State the undesirable foreigners form 40 per cent of the population of our jails and insane asylums.

Think of the tax all of this means on our citizens. The attempt of the foreign steamship companies, their paid attorneys, and the corrupt press to raise the cry of religious bigotry and racial animosity in order to injure the cause of immigration restriction has failed.

This is a question that affects every American no matter where he was born. It is a fight for existence. The clinching argument in favor of the adoption of the illiteracy test is the report of the Congressional Immigration Commission, which declared that many undeniably undesirable persons enter every year. There is a growing criminal class in this country, due to foreign immigration.

Organized labor has demanded restrictive legislation, resolutions have been adopted time and again by the labor unions, and the leaders like John Mitchell and Samuel Gompers have repeatedly spoken out against the admission of so many undesirables.

You are a friend of organized labor, even though it has been alleged that you were reported absent or not voting on many measures that came up in the last session of Congress. I am not inclined to believe the press reports that you are opposed to the illiteracy test, and on behalf of others, as well as myself, I urge you to vote for and secure other votes for the measure.

Yours, truly,

EDWARD DWYER,
336 Seventy-eighth Street.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., December 10, 1912.

Those who would open our ports to the scum of Europe quote President Charles W. Eliot as being opposed to restriction, and yet the following from the New York Times of February 1, 1913, shows that Dr. Eliot would keep out the very kind that the illiteracy test would debar.

EX-PRESIDENT CHARLES W. ELIOT A RESTRICTIONIST NOW.

ELIOT WOULD BAR BACHELORS—PROPOSES IMMIGRATION LAW LIMITING ADMISSIONS TO 15 PER CENT.

BOSTON, January 31.

This afternoon, in discussing a bill now before the legislature which seeks to establish an immigration inspection board for Massachusetts, Dr. Eliot told a large audience at the Twentieth Century Club that the large numbers of unmarried male immigrants should be restricted to 15 per cent of the entire number of foreign-born admitted to the country.

Dr. Eliot argued against the blending of the different races, and his point taken in opposition to allowing the wholesale immigration of bachelors was in support of this argument. In taking this stand on the immigration question Dr. Eliot added his support to the plan advocated by United States Senator DILLINGHAM, of Vermont, chairman of the Senate Immigration Committee, who said it would be a good thing for the Nation to rule that only married men accompanied by their families should enter the country as immigrants.

The great metropolitan press of the country is becoming alarmed over the conditions growing out of the tremendous influx of illiterates from foreign shores. I will read a few:

[From the New York Sun, June 27, 1912.]

When we remember the sources of a very large proportion—almost the bulk—of our great immigration in recent years the reason for the difficulties created thereby are easy to see. These droves of newcomers are drawn almost entirely from eastern and southern Europe, and it comes practically to this, that the illiteracy of those nations is transported to America in shipload lots, and that however broad the spaces in this country and however great the opportunities of betterment for everybody, congestion and clogging of all usual or even extraordinary provisions for education and general Americanization of the illiterate and variously defective immigrants must result, at least temporarily, in the cities and States where they come and stay in such large numbers. The reasonableness of placing some check upon such an obviously intolerable abuse of a welcome to these shores is evident enough; blind opposition to any such measures must provoke reasonable resentment and proper measures of self-protection.

[From the Saturday Evening Post, May 18, 1912.]

ILLITERATE IMMIGRANTS.

Since the Spanish-American War we have received two and a quarter million immigrants who were unable to read or write in any language, nearly all of whom undoubtedly were unable to speak English. Their only means of communication was the spoken word in their mother tongue. Naturally these immigrants tend to congregate in foreign-speaking, foreign-thinking communities. Wholly dependent for information upon a fellow countryman's word of mouth, they are especially liable to exploitation.

Illiteracy shuts them out from most opportunities for bettering their condition. Inevitably they work for the lowest pay; and, coming in such great numbers, there is no doubt they tend to depress the general level of wages in the industries they enter.

It is quite true, as urged by those who oppose a literary test in our immigration laws, that character is more important than education; but the point has no practical relevancy, because it is plainly impossible to frame any statutory test for character. If there is to be any restriction upon immigration it should bar out the least desirable; and no candid person will deny that, by and large, the illiterate immigrant is less desirable than the literate. His illiteracy raises a strong presumption that he has been badly conditioned socially and politically. It handicaps him tremendously in comprehending American conditions and purposes.

We shall, as a matter of course, bar known criminals, the insane, and paupers. If there is to be any finer discrimination as regards immigration from European countries the literacy test ought to be adopted.

The following from the Cincinnati Time-Star—Hon. Charles Taft's paper—of December 26, 1912, speaks earnestly on the subject:

CONGRESS AND IMMIGRATION.

The country has noted with rather less interest than the subject deserves the effort of Congress to provide a "literacy" test for future immigration into the country.

A bill providing that no immigrant who is unable to read in some recognized language shall enter the United States hereafter has passed the House. Another bill along similar lines has passed the Senate. The two measures are now in conference and there seems to be little reason to doubt that an agreement will be reached before long.

Some newspapers have made more or less serious objection to the new immigration bills. They hold that a literacy test will not get to the bottom of the immigration problem. They hold that the country needs all the cheap labor it can get. To bar out a man because he can not read, they say, will keep out of the United States a great deal of the new bone and sinew that we need in our national make-up, at the same time allowing many useless and even dangerous persons who happen to be able to read to get into the country.

Undoubtedly there are some valid objections to a literacy test for immigrants. It may be that a better method can be devised for cutting down the present tremendous bulk of immigration into this country. However, the fact remains that the immigration question has been one of the big questions before Congress for a good many years now and nothing has been done. And this in spite of the fact that thinking men all over the country have fully realized the menace to our free institutions involved in the arrival of people without training in self-government at such a tremendous rate that not even our remarkable powers of assimilation can take care of them.

No reasonable man questions the tremendous service the immigrant has rendered this country. As a matter of fact, all of us owe our existence as Americans to the immigration of one period or another.

But the flow of new population into the United States has been very different these past 15 years from what it was before that time. Until toward the close of the nineteenth century the people who sought homes in this country were practically all of one blood, easily capable of amalgamation, and readily susceptible to the American ideals of self-government. English, Irish, Scotch, German—these may not have been brothers in blood, but they were at least first cousins.

Then came a sudden onrush of new immigrants from southern and eastern Europe. Go over the immigration list of any great liner arriving at New York nowadays, and how many English, Irish, Scotch, or German names will you find?

The proportion, of course, is very small. Practically all our immigration of to-day is made up of people from southern and eastern Europe. And at the same time that the character of the flow of population into the United States has changed the number of immigrants arriving has jumped from a hundred or two hundred thousand to nearly a million in the average year. In good times we get over a million; in bad times the number diminishes considerably, but the average is very high.

We are not saying anything against the Italians, the Russian Jews, and the other peoples who have provided the bulk of our immigration in recent years. Everybody who has rubbed up against the immigrant knows that these peoples have given some splendid citizens to this Republic. They have given some citizens of doubtful value, too, but the average, at least where the light of American institutions has had a chance to get in, has been fairly good.

But the whole matter does not rest upon a question of quality. We are getting more immigrants than we can handle, speaking not in a commercial but in a patriotic sense. We ought not to take in newcomers faster than we can educate them up to the old American ideals of self-government. It should never be forgotten that free institutions will live in this country only so long as we maintain a high average of individual character and individual intelligence.

Congress appointed a commission to go into the matter of immigration a number of years ago. This commission, made up of men admirably fitted for the work in hand, worked hard for several years. It visited most of the countries of Europe, making careful study of conditions there as well as of conditions in this country. When its report was finally made public it was seen that the commission was very strongly in favor of some positive action by the American Government toward the drastic restriction of immigration.

It is many months since that report was made. Congress can not now be accused of taking action on it hastily. The majority of the Members of the House and Senate have come to the conclusion that the most promising device for solving the immigration problem is a literacy test. If on trial this device proves a failure, we can try something else. But in the meantime something will have been done.

The cry is that we need the laborers, and yet here is what a recent number of the Gloucester Times says about that branch of the question:

THE IMMIGRATION QUESTION AGAIN.

The conference of charities and correction held in Cleveland last week has a very vigorous discussion of the immigration question, and finally by a vote expressed itself in favor of unrestricted immigration. In criticizing the conclusions of the Federal immigration commission Cyrus L. Sulzberger, of New York, said:

"The only accurate generalization made by the restrictions on the subject of immigration is that the nationality of the immigrants has changed; that whereas in former years the bulk of the immigrants came from northwestern Europe, it has lately been coming from south and eastern Europe. This is obviously true, but it is not true, as is so often asserted, that while the so-called older immigration was desirable the newer is undesirable."

And then he went on to argue that the newcomers make a better showing in regard to alcoholism, insanity, hospital costs, criminality, and various other points of statistical comparison than the settlers from northern Europe.

Let all this be granted, although it is far from being proved as yet, and the main question is by no means settled. It is not strange that immigrants should be very solicitous that others should have the same privilege which they have themselves enjoyed. And yet it remains true that there are economic reasons which make it desirable that the incoming tide should be restrained, at least for a few years. Our cities are flooded with unskilled laborers. There is not a manufacturing city of any size which does not have in it thousands for whom there is practically no work. Let a mill manager advertise for boys, and he is besieged by adults who wish to do the work and are willing to take the boy's pay. Conditions are seriously upset by such a large movement of population in this direction. There is certainly nothing unreasonable in itself and nothing unfair to other people that for a series of years we should limit somewhat the number who are allowed to come in. All other Nations find it necessary to do this. And the United States is fast finding it necessary, all charity conferences to the contrary notwithstanding.

The following is the attitude of a large number of educators, labor leaders, and financiers on this very question, and the comment of a Boston paper on it:

ATTITUDE OF LEADING EDUCATORS, LABOR LEADERS, AND FINANCIERS OF NEW ENGLAND.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

While we are aware that there is a world-wide rise in the cost of living and that there are local causes of disturbance and distress which need correcting, we none the less believe that distressing conditions in the United States are greatly aggravated by the fact that the less skilled classes of labor are subjected to an artificial and unnecessary competition. This competition is due to the unlimited importation from numerous parts of the world of laborers often induced to come here by persons interested financially in their coming, whose controlling interest is not in the personal welfare of the immigrant or in the general welfare of our country.

We believe the evidence to be conclusive that under these conditions the maintenance of a proper American standard of living among the laboring classes of our country is impossible in this State, or in any other State subject to these same conditions. We therefore most respectfully urge that this overshadowing menace be not ignored by you, and that you relieve this situation by limiting the importation of labor to a point where the American standard of living among great bodies of laborers shall no longer be broken down.

EDUCATORS.

[Editorial from the Monitor (Christian Science), Boston, Mass., June 12, 1912.]

Massachusetts signers of a petition to Congress for restriction of immigration along lines proposed in the original Dillingham bill are of a kind that gives the document more than usual significance. The presidents of Harvard University, the Institute of Technology and Williams College, several of the most eminent economists of Harvard's faculty, and a veteran social settlement worker, Robert A. Woods, speaks for educators and investigators of social consequences of lax standards of admission, and they represent that particular element of society able to look at the issue somewhat objectively and disinterestedly. Joined with them are six representative leaders of organized labor in New England, who deprecate the lowering of standards of living and undermining of the wage scale caused by constant importation of immigrants. Last but not least there are the names of representative makers of the financial, industrial, and commercial prosperity of New England.

Filing of such a petition with such signatures is symptomatic of conditions that are forcing thoughtful Americans to consider more carefully than formerly some of the ultimate effects upon republicanism and civilization of wholesale and undiscriminate methods of increase of the foreign-born population which went on for generations unchecked. The fact that no other section of the English-speaking race has ever permitted such a process of race amalgamation as the United States has invited is beginning to be weighed for what it is worth; and Canada's present rigid testing of her would-be settlers is not without its exemplary effect on the neighboring Republic.

New England naturally is the more disturbed by the results of the past policy of laxity, because of the startling multiplication within her borders, especially in her industrial centers, of people to whom past sectional ideals do not make as strong appeal as they would were the emigrants from other lands and of other faiths. The task now being thrown upon many of the New England cities in the way of assimilation and Americanization of newcomers is greater than they are equal to. Hence the breakdowns of law and order such as were seen recently in Lawrence.

The following are resolutions of State legislatures, labor, farmer, patriotic, and other organizations on the subject; also of labor leaders and the declarations of other great thinkers and newspapers. Seventeen State legislatures have adopted memorials, of which the following is a sample:

Whereas the United States Immigration Commission, after four years' investigation and the expenditure of $1,000,000, has made a 42-volume report to Congress; and

Whereas it is being proposed that the immigration evils from which the Northeastern States are suffering be relieved by diverting and distributing the aliens now crowding into and congesting the slums, sweatshops, and city centers of the Northeast; and

Whereas the Immigration Commission clearly points out that this is the only country with any considerable net foreign immigration, our laws and administrative policy are the weakest of any new country, and that "substantial restriction is demanded by economic, moral, and social considerations," and the illiteracy test is recommended "as the most feasible single method for excluding undesirable immigration": Therefore be it

Resolved by the State Senate of Tennessee (the House concurring), That we hereby memorialize Congress to immediately enact some such illiteracy test as is recommended by the Immigration Commission, as is law in Australia, New Zealand, and other new countries, pass other needed legislation along the lines of the Immigration Commission's suggestions, and do not pass any legislation looking to the diversion and distribution of the kind of alien population that is now congesting the northeastern cities and causing so many evils there: And be it further

Resolved, That a certified copy of this resolution be sent by the secretary of the senate at once to the President of the United States, to our two United States Senators, and each of our Representatives at Washington, D. C., with the request that it be presented to Congress and properly referred.

Adopted February 7, 1911.

N. BAXTER, Jr.,
Speaker of the Senate.
A. M. LEACH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved February 9, 1911.

BEN W. HOOPER, Governor.

I, W. D. Scruggs, chief clerk of the senate, hereby certify that this is a true and correct copy of senate joint resolution No. 27, adopted February 7, 1911.

FARMERS' EDUCATIONAL AND COOPERATIVE UNION OF AMERICA,
OFFICE OF SECRETARY TREASURER,
Rogers, Ark., November 28, 1912.

HONORED SIR: In keeping with instructions of the National Farmers' Union in annual session at Chattanooga, Tenn., September 3, 4, and 5, I have the honor to submit herewith a resolution recommended in the report of the committee on immigration and adopted unanimously by the convention.

Respectfully, yours,
[SEAL.] A. C. DAVIS, Secretary-Treasurer.

Resolution offered by the committee on immigration.

Whereas the Immigration Commission has reported recommending the very legislation long urged and advocated by this organization and its vast membership scattered throughout 28 States; and

Whereas a bill, S. 3175, containing this legislation passed the Senate April 19, 1912, and has been before the House since: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America in eighth national convention at Chattanooga, Tenn., this 5th day of September 1912, That we indorse the legislative recommendations of the Immigration Commission, commend the patriotic action of the Senate in passing Senate bill No. 3175, containing the legislation recommended by the commission and advocated by us, and urge upon the House the speedy passage of the bill next December, as promised; and be it further

Resolved, That the national secretary send a certified copy of this resolution to every Member of Congress at the opening of the next session.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN MCKINNEY (California), Chairman,
LAWSON E. BROWN (Georgia), Secretary,
O. P. FORD (Alabama),

NEW YORK UNITED GARMENT WORKERS INDORSE ILLITERACY TEST.

Editor Sullivan was invited to address the board on the immigration question. The following resolutions were adopted:

"The general executive board of the United Garment Workers of America, at a session of its quarterly meeting in New York City, on Thursday, June 23, 1905, unanimously passed the following:

"'Resolved, That the unprecedented movement of the very poor to America from Europe in the last three years has resulted in wholly changing the previous social, political, and economic aspects of the immigration question. The enormous accessions to the ranks of our competing wageworkers, being to a great extent unemployed, or only partly employed, at uncertain wages, are lowering the standard of living among the masses of the working people of this country, without giving promise to uplift the great body of immigrants themselves. The overstocking of the labor markets has become a menace to many trades-unions, especially those of the lesser skilled workers. Little or no benefit can possibly accrue to an increasing proportion of the great numbers yet coming; they are unfitted to battle intelligently for their rights in this Republic, to whose present burdens they but add others still greater. The fate of the majority of the foreign wageworkers now here has served to demonstrate on the largest possible scale that immigration is no solution of the world-wide problem of poverty.

"'Resolved, That we call on American trades-unionists to oppose emphatically the proposed scheme of Government distribution of immigrants, since it would be an obvious means of directly and cheaply furnishing strike breakers to the "combine" capitalists now seeking the destruction of the trades-unions.

"'Resolved, That we condemn all forms of assisted immigration through charitable agencies or otherwise.

"'Resolved, That we warn the poor of the earth against coming to America with false hopes; it is our duty to inform them that the economic situation in this country is changing with the same rapidity as the methods of industry and commerce.

"'Resolved, That we call on the Government of the United States for a righteous relief of the wageworkers now in America. We desire that it should either (1) suspend immigration totally for a term of years, or (2) put into force such an illiteracy test as will exclude the ignorant and also impose such a head tax as be sufficient to send back all those who within a stated period should become public dependents.'"

Resolution.

Whereas it is estimated that the outflow of gold from this country to Europe, due to the present system of immigration, amounted in the year 1909 to $357,000,000; and

Whereas it is admitted that this system is encouraged by the Governments of countries from which the hordes of emigrants are coming hither, for the very reason that the aliens send back to their friends and relatives abroad a large percentage of their earnings, which is in turn paid to foreign landlords as rents or to foreign Governments as taxes, thus indirectly bolstering Asiatic and European despotism and feudalism at the expense of American resources while intensifying the struggle for existence among our own people, greatly lessening the opportunities for home building among us, tending mightily to race suicide by increasing the difficulties of raising children, lowering moral standards, weakening patriotic sentiment, and breeding contempt for American customs, laws, and traditions, and, in fine, driving plenty, peace, and innocence from our shores; and

Whereas alien corporations, and the outlaws and vampires who conduct the white-slave trade, are known to thrive by reason of the immigrant traffic, and to combine with "bosses" in industry and "bosses" in politics for the promotion of sordid and corrupt schemes that imperil both our industrial and political systems, exasperating labor, paralyzing capital, prostituting the ballot, assailing our courts of justice, nullifying good laws, initiating bad ones, and jeopardizing the existence of constitutional free government among us; and

Whereas information is at hand tending to show that our Representative in Congress is disposed to stifle all legislation in that body which is designed to remedy the manifold and crying evils here complained of, and that he has, to that extent, demonstrated his lack of diligence, probity, patriotism, and fidelity to his constituency; and

Whereas an election for Members of Congress is approaching, at which our own Representative must appeal again to the electors for their votes: Therefore be it

Resolved, 1. That we, the Immigration Restriction League, of Brooklyn, N. Y., representing many thousand voters, are sorely aggrieved by the failure of Congress to pass suitable laws for the restriction of immigration to the United States.

2. That we condemn as unfaithful, unwise, and undesirable any and every Member of Congress who has failed to urge the passage of such laws.

3. That we pledge our support at the coming election to candidates known to favor the speedy enactment of such laws, and demand that every candidate shall, before election day, publicly and distinctly announce his views and declare his purposes respecting such legislation, and that any candidate who neglects or refuses so to do will be regarded as hostile to our cause.

Dr. JAMES L. ARMSTRONG, President.
THOS. W. CHRISTY, Secretary.

Adopted April 14, 1910.

[Editorial from recent issue of Gazette-Times, of Pittsburgh, Pa.]

The statement is made that there is a perceptible shortage in the supply of common labor in Pittsburgh and western Pennsylvania. For this class of workmen industrial and development concerns rely upon foreigners chiefly from Italy and Austria-Hungary. Tens of thousands of immigrants returned to Europe during the depression following the panic of 1907, and the influx latterly has not been as great as in previous years. Meantime Brazil and Argentina are proving more attractive because of the abnormal prosperity in those South American countries.

This is a state of affairs fortunately which Pennsylvania can bear with equanimity. There may be temporary inconvenience caused by inability to secure enough men, but in the long run matters will balance themselves. In any event in the proportion that immigration of this kind falls off will the process of assimilation and Americanization make headway. Naturally the employer, anxious to maintain production and keep pace with competitors, considers the incoming alien purely from his capacity to work—a unit in the great system of building and making. Society and the State, however, must estimate him from another angle, and that is as to his quality as a citizen. There is to-day in this State no more important, difficult, or far-reaching problem confronting the community than that of the proper education and civilization of these foreigners. It is of a great deal more consequence to the Commonwealth that they become moral, lawabiding, patriotic, sober, and thrifty than that mere production be kept up to the requirements of demand. Industrious they are, willing, competent, and tractable, but unless they are subject to stimulating and elevating influences and are taught to have a better regard for American laws and customs their settlement in this country is neither for their good nor ours.

Court and police records bear terrible testimony to the price we are paying for immigration of this character, and there is every reason why Congress should so amend the statutes that it will be impossible longer to bring so many thousands of men whose presence is desirable only because they can be used as common labor. If there were less of such immigration to our shores, it is not improbable that there would be a revival of interest in America among the more intelligent Europeans.

Resolution adopted at a public meeting held in New York City, May 17, 1912, urging the passage by the House of Representatives of the Dillingham immigration bill (S. 3175).

Whereas a meeting recently held at Cooper Union, presided over by a former Congressman, once a member of the Immigration Commission and now attorney for the Navigazione Generale Italiana and other foreign steamship lines, at which a resolution was adopted in opposition to the Dillingham immigration bill, which contains legislation recommended by the Immigration Commission and which passed the Senate April 19, after three months' consideration and many days' debate; and

Whereas that meeting was called and addressed by agents of the steamship companies, padrones, and others peculiarly and pecuniarily interested, directly or indirectly, in the free importation of cheap labor and the unrestricted immigration of undesirables; and

Whereas that meeting did not represent the sentiment or the voting citizenship of the city; and

Whereas the financial and other burdens of our existing inadequate immigration laws are shown by the statement of Gov. Dix and other State officials that unrestricted immigration is costing the taxpayers of New York over $8,000,000 a year for the care of dependents and defectives, and by the present investigation, and were pointed out by the congressional Immigration Commission after its five years' thorough investigation, which reported in 42 volumes that our existing laws are "weak and ineffectual," recommended "substantial restriction" as "demanded by economic, social, and moral considerations," and found the "reading and writing test" to be one of the "most feasible methods" for excluding undesirable immigration: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this meeting urges upon the House of Representatives the immediate passage of the Dillingham, or Immigration Commission, bill (S. 3175) in order to put this country on a par with other new countries, such as Canada and Australia; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of this meeting send a copy of this resolution to the President, the Vice President, Senator H. C. LODGE, and each Member of the House at Washington, D. C.

[Extract from article entitled "Protect the workman," by John Mitchell, The Outlook, August, 1911.]

The American workman recognizes the necessity of reasonable restrictions upon the admission of future immigrants; he realizes that his own welfare depends upon being able to work and to live in harmony and fellowship with those who have been admitted and are now a part of our industrial and social life.

The American wage earner, be he native or immigrant, entertains no prejudice against his fellow from other lands; but, as self-preservation is the first law of nature, our workmen believe and contend that their labor should be protected against the competition of an induced immigration comprised largely of men whose standards and ideals are lower than our own. The demand for the exclusion of Asiatics, especially the Chinese and the Hindus, is based solely upon the fact that as a race their standard of living is extremely low and their assimilation by Americans impossible. The American wage earner is not an advocate of the principle of indiscriminate exclusion which finds favor in some quarters, and he is not likely to become an advocate of such a policy unless he is driven to this extreme as a matter of self-preservation. He fails, however, to see the consistency of a legislative protective policy which does not, at the same time that it protects industry, give equal protection to American labor. If the products of our mills and factories are to be protected by a tariff on articles manufactured abroad, then, by the same token, labor should be protected against an unreasonable competition from a stimulated and excessive immigration. * * *

If we are going to regulate immigration at all, we should prescribe by law definite conditions, the application of which would result in securing only those immigrants whose standards and ideals compare favorably with our own. To that end wage earners believe—

First. That, in addition to the restrictions imposed by the laws at present in force, the head tax of $4 now collected should be increased to $10.

Second. That each immigrant, unless he be a political refugee, should bring with him not less than $25, in addition to the amount required to pay transportation to the point where he expects to find employment.

Third. That immigrants between the ages of 14 and 50 years should be able to read a section of the Constitution of the United States, either in our language, in their own language, or in the language of the country from which they come.

[From the New York Sun, Mar. 28, 1912, Evening Edition.]

A COMING ISSUE.

In more ways than one the present and the near future seem likely to offer years of unusual test for the Republic in which we live. A desire to experiment with the iridescent toy of pure democracy has already disturbed the workings of representative government in various parts of the country. And impatience with courts and constitutions may well cause graver confusion. The actual evil from such experiments may not be great, and every try at pure democracy contains a fresh demonstration of the futility of such reversion to primitive methods in a modern state. Nor have we any patience with those gloomy dyspeptics who consider that American political sense has gone to the dogs. It hasn't—and it is a pleasure to observe it attacking the new problems at once with zest and patience.

But America is one thing, and America overlaid or interlarded with large slices of the most ignorant and unreliable portions of Europe is another. And the indeterminate factor in the coming years—the coming issue—is the question of how much further we can permit free, unsifted immigration. Our current immigration both raises the most serious problems now forming for governmental solution, and also, by lowering the intelligence of the electorate, furnishes the gravest hindrance to their solution. The sudden eruption of the gaunt figure of syndicalism in our labor troubles is the most ominous sign of the times. We have had our strikes aplenty in the past. But the first considerable development of an actually revolutionary spirit comes to-day—and comes, as lately at Lawrence and now at Paterson, among the un-American immigrants from southern Europe.

The question is not one to be settled in a day or in a year. We shall doubtless have it with us for a long while to come. But we think the time is ripe for a very serious debate upon the problem, and actually for a beginning of restrictive measures. The first brute need for hands to lay open an unexplored continent has unquestionably passed. Such need as remains must be balanced against the paramount need for minds to govern a highly developed nation.

Fortunately, the whole subject has been most thoroughly examined in recent years and the facts are before the Nation. The recent congressional investigation resulted in a plentiful array of statistics, and especially in a single volume, The Immigration Problem, prepared by Prof. Jenks and Prof. Lauck, who aided in the study. Much of their interesting report was stated to the Senate recently by Senator SIMMONS, of North Carolina. The question is before that body in connection with a bill codifying the immigration laws. A provision for an educational test was cut out in committee, but has been offered as an amendment by the Senator from North Carolina. To quote the conclusion of his argument:

"In nearly every State we are expending annually enormous sums of money to educate the boys and the girls who are to be the citizens of the future, who are to control the destiny of this country and its institutions. In many States there are compulsory attendance laws. The taxpayers are assuming this great financial burden; they are insisting upon this higher degree of education for our boys and girls because they appreciate and thoroughly understand the fact that in an enlightened democracy such as ours, a country where we have sovereignty citizenship, the safety of our institutions, nay, the perpetuity of those institutions, depends upon the measure of intelligence of its people.

"Here, sir, we are spending annually upon our boys hundreds of millions of dollars to fit them for citizenship, because we know that that better fits them for participation in a Government like ours. Yet, Mr. President, in the face of this fact, in the face of this large expenditure of money for this purpose, when the Nation as a whole comes to act we open the doors and admit every year to our citizenship between 200,000 and 300,000 of as densely ignorant and illiterate peoples as live under God's sun. Why should we do this? Is it not a contradiction in policy? Is it not inconsistent with our whole educational history, especially of the last 25 or 30 years?"

The facts which he quoted to support his view are familiar enough. The change in the character of immigration in the last 25 years is notorious. Of the total immigration prior to 1883, 95 per cent came from England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, and Switzerland. From 1883 to 1907, 81 per cent came from Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, Greece, Italy, Montenegro, Poland, Portugal, Roumania, Russia, Servia, Spain, Syria, and Turkey. This latter stream is one-half illiterate; more than a third does not settle here, but returns to its source, and the rest largely lives to itself and resists assimilation. All of which facts are admirably illustrated, for example, in the racial condition existing in Lawrence, Mass.

Whether the literacy test is a sound method of restriction is a moot question. Nine out of the ten members of the congressional investigating committee agreed upon it as the best practical means, though frankly admitting its shortcomings. Possibly such a test, if supplemented by other restrictions, might meet the needs of the situation. But the point we would make is that the time has come when some restrictive plan must be devised and applied. The question admits of no division between capitalist and laborer. It has passed beyond the range of purely economic discussion and entered a field wherein all Americans must unite to grapple with a serious threat against the solidarity of the Nation. We trust neither Congress nor the people will find a presidential election too engrossing to permit the immediate consideration of this pressing issue.

FORESEES ALIEN PERIL—BRITISH CONSUL GENERAL WRITES ABOUT IMMIGRATION PROBLEM—SWARMS OF ILLITERATES—MR. BENNETT EXPRESSES FEAR OF LESSENING OF ANGLO-SAXON SUPREMACY IN AMERICA.

In his annual report to the British Parliament, Courtenay Walter Bennett, British consul general at New York, expresses a vague fear that the enormous influx of immigrants, with different ideas of law, liberty, and justice than those who founded the country, may lead to serious trouble in the future. He intimated that the outlook indicated a lessening of Anglo-Saxon supremacy.

The report, which consists of 50 printed pages, covers a wide range of topics, from the usual trade reports to a study of social and economic conditions of the country.

The future Manhattan Island, in the opinion of Consul General Bennett, will be a city of towering skyscrapers, with rents so high that the average business house will be forced to seek quarters outside of Manhattan Island.

He also points out that New York City is losing its supremacy as the money center of the United States, which is due, he declares, to the increase of wealth in other parts of the Union. The basis for this conclusion he found in the bank clearances during the years 1905–1911, which show that New York in 1911 had only 58 per cent of the entire bank clearances of the United States as opposed to 65 in 1905.

Speaking of the influx of immigration, Mr. Bennett said:

"The new immigration is illiterate in the proportion of 35.6 per cent compared with 2.7 per cent of the old. It acquires English very slowly—often not at all—while races of the old immigration either spoke English to begin with or a tongue so allied to English that its acquisition was easy. It is very largely a male immigration, whereas the old was an immigration of families; it is nomadic, where the old was settled; it is comparatively segregated; finally, it is not an immigration at all in the sense that the old was, but an advancing and receding flood."

MANY GO HOME TO STAY.

Elaborating on this, he points out that one-third of all the immigrants now coming to this country return to their native lands, and of this number two-thirds remain there.

After reviewing the cosmopolitanism and heterogeneity of New York's population, Mr. Bennett says:

"In many quarters the belief is held that the gates of immigration have been opened too widely and that the enormous influx of people with different ideas of law and liberty and justice may lead to serious trouble in the future. Whether the mass of new immigrants will be absorbed in the old and eventually turned into valuable American citizens or whether the original ethnic elements, pressed upon on the one side by the colored population, which is increasing rapidly in numbers and is to-day estimated at over 10,000,000, and on the other side by the mass of new immigrants, much of which is not Christian in belief, will be modified, subdivided, or drowned in the flood of foreigners, and thus rendered impotent to exercise its proper influence, are questions which occasion present anxiety, but which can only be answered in the unknown future."

Continuing, Mr. Bennett dwells on labor conditions generally, and observes:

"It is also perhaps desirable to point out that labor conditions in the States are approaching conditions found in Europe more rapidly than is generally thought. The labor market is overstocked; unemployment, especially among the unskilled laborers, is very prevalent, while competition for a vacant berth is as keen in New York as it is in London."

TELLS OF SKYSCRAPER PROBLEM.

The skyscraper problem Mr. Bennett describes in part:

"It appears to be the wish of everybody to have their offices or places of business as near to Wall Street or the docks as possible. This wish naturally sent up the rents, the land became more valuable, and at the same time the landlords wished to make as much profit as possible from their landed property. The space available for building being limited, and only sufficient to accommodate hundreds, it was found necessary to devise a scheme for making it suitable for thousands. In London a somewhat similar difficulty was experienced, and the tendency was met by building story after story beneath the level of the street. In New York the architects built upward story upon story up to 52 stories in the newest buildings, and the age of the skyscraper arrived. Land, therefore, which under normal circumstances could only give homes or office room to, say, 200 or 300, now gives room for 10,000, or even 14,000. The extra cost in building is more than covered by the increased rents asked and obtained.

"To-day, forming, as they do, a sort of vacuum into which hundreds of thousands of human beings are being projected every day at about the same hour, and from which they are ejected every evening, also in crowds, the skyscraper has paralyzed all efforts to relieve traffic congestion in New York.

"New roads, ferries, railways, subways, and elevated tracks have been made, but as fast as they are completed the growing traffic overtakes their carrying powers, and the congestion remains as bad as ever it did.

"The day apparently must come, and before many years are past, when the skyscrapers have brought the city to an impasse, when millions will be working where thousands were intended to work, where rents have risen to such a figure that they can not profitably be made, and when people will begin to find it necessary to carry on their business more cheaply in places situated not on Manhattan Island."

ATTITUDE OF NATIONAL GRANGE.

Resolution adopted at the national session, 1912.

Whereas the Senate has passed an excellent bill, S. 3175, containing the legislation recently recommended by a congressional investigating commission as necessary to exclude undesirable immigration, and the House leaders have announced that the measure will be considered "the first thing in December"; and

Whereas we have recommended that the head tax be increased, the illiteracy test be enacted, the foreign steamships be fined for bringing undesirables, and that other judicious measures be adopted by the Congress of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved by the National Grange in forty-sixth annual session, That we urge this needed legislation.

[From the Outlook, Sept. 14, 1912.]

ATTITUDE OF THE RAILROAD BROTHERHOODS—THE LITERACY TEST FOR IMMIGRANTS.

May I have the honor of your columns to say a few words in regard to the immigration question discussed editorially and by correspondence in your issue of June 22?

All labor leaders are agreed, so far as I know, and my acquaintance is extensive, that some substantial curb ought to be placed at once on the present enormous influx and efflux of foreign labor. And while I know of no official identified with any of the various labor organizations of the country who would take exception to your statement that the illiteracy test "would be inadequate to protect this country from (all) undesirable immigrants," I feel certain that practically all of them would be inclined to dissent from your other statement that it would not help "secure those that are desirable."

There is absolutely no question about the Immigration Commission's finding that there is an "oversupply of unskilled labor in this country," which affects indirectly, but none the less deleteriously, wages and conditions of employment in the skilled trades. For years our organizations have recognized with increasing conviction the need of just such legislation as that recommended by the commission, and have gone on record at our conventions and before congressional committees as favoring it, and particularly the reading and writing test, because we find that those who can not read or write are the ones at Lawrence in textile industries, at Bethlehem in the steel mills, and even at work in the railway construction camps, as pointed out by the Immigration Commission, that are the easiest induced to come here, to be hoodwinked into coming, to be worked at lower wages and longer hours, and that they are the ones who render conditions less safe and less sanitary and who are used by the labor exchanges, the large employers of cheap labor, and the like to prevent an improvement of conditions commensurate with inventions and changing needs, an increase in wages to keep pace with the increased cost of living, etc.

The commission emphasizes the fact, I believe, that the illiterate, as one would expect, are the most difficult to organize into a law-abiding union and the easiest to become the tools of violent agitators, such as have made their appearance recently during labor troubles at Lawrence and other places.

With your statement that transient workers coming to go back with their parsimonious hoardings, unaccompanied by their families, should be excluded, and that a limit should be placed upon the number coming, I believe all students of labor conditions agree and at least 80 per cent of the thinking public. A large number, considerably over half, I believe, would be in favor of going further for a specified time, in order to allow the forces of assimilation to relieve the situation. But the rub comes as to the tests to accomplish this purpose. The Republican Party had declared for the illiteracy test in specified terms, and a general declaration of the Democratic Party has been interpreted on the stump in a campaign or two to mean the same identical thing.

In your editorial you advocate an increased head tax, the requirement of some money in the pocket, which is law in Canada, among other restrictive provisions and orders that make our weak laws look ridiculous, a character certificate, and the limitation of numbers coming per annum. But would any one or all of these "secure those that are desirable" and keep out those that are "undesirable"? Would not any test, as a matter of fact, in academic argument, keep out some possibly desirable person? And could not even our present feeble laws, excluding merely a few of the undeniably undesirable and objectionable, be said to do this? Do they not keep out desirable immigrants, even though the law is enforced very liberally and generously and charitably? In my experience I know of no piece of legislation that has not had brought against its enactment the charge that it would do some hardship, and nowadays we hear much said about the administration of the laws by the courts being a "reproach to civilization." But is that any reason for abolishing, as the nihilist and anarchist would, all government? Or for the owner of a barn, using the same reasoning, burning it to destroy the rats?

To us who make a specialty of studying, exclusively almost, the needs of labor and labor problems, the illiteracy test seems, as it did to the Immigration Commission, "the most feasible" for starting the proper regulation and control of immigration, because it would, as pointed out by the commission, work the least possible harm and do the greatest possible good of any of the tests considered, and by so recommending it they, as I understand, did not preclude the enactment of additional and other tests, and did not mean to recommend it as a substitute for other existing as well as proposed legislation, such as you mention.

[Views of Senator ELIHU ROOT. Extract from speech delivered in United States Senate April 19, 1912.]

Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment striking out the illiteracy clause. I believe the time has come when it will be for the benefit of the people of the United States, including all the millions of immigrants who have come into this country in recent years, to put into our immigration law a clause which will require the immigrants who are admitted here to pass the test of ability to read and write.

I intend to say but a very few words on the subject. I am not in favor of this proposition for the reason that it will tend to exclude criminals and anarchists. I do not suppose it is intended for that purpose at all, and the fact that it will not accomplish that purpose is no argument against the test. I am not in favor of the test of illiteracy because I think there are not many good people who would become useful citizens and who can not read and write at this time. It may well be that such a test will exclude a good many people whom we should be glad to have here. But, Mr. President, the question is not whether this test will still leave it possible for some people to come in who ought to come in, or whether it will keep out certain people whom it would be well to keep out, but whether such a test will be beneficial to the people of the United States.

It seems clear to me that it will be beneficial as a whole. I think there is a general and well-founded feeling that we have been taking in immigrants from the Old World in recent years rather more rapidly than we have been assimilating them. They have been coming in rather more rapidly than they have been acquiring American habits of thought and the American spirit of government, and it could not well be otherwise in view of the fact that of the 9,555,000 immigrants who have come into this country during the 12 years following the War with Spain, 2,238,801 over 14 years of age were unable to read and write, with the result that we have many great communities composed of people gathered together unable to speak the English language, unable to read the newspapers or the magazines or the books through the agency of which a knowledge of what is going on in the world and a knowledge of the principles of our Government may be communicated to our people.

These communities of foreigners, speaking a foreign tongue, with foreign habits and thoughts, cut off by inability to read from the great body of the people of America, cut off from our ideas, from our thoughts, our sentiments, our feelings, our purposes by their own ignorance, are encysted in the body politic of America and the body social of America and are not a part, in fact, of the organized community which we call the United States.

Mr. President, there are two special considerations that I wish to lay before the Senate in its dealing with the question whether it is desirable for us to impose this limit. One is that the coming of great numbers of these people who are wholly illiterate and who have to take, of course, the lowest rate of wages, whose minds are not open to the ordinary opportunities for bettering their condition, does tend to break down the American standard of wages, and to compel American workmen, whether they be born here or be a part of the 9,000,000 who have come in since the War with Spain, to compete with a standard of wages and a standard of living that they ought not to be required to compete with.

Now, that is the reason why within a comparatively recent time the workingmen of the country who formerly were moved by sympathy with the friends they had left behind them on the other side of the ocean have now come to feel that it is essential that something be done, so that this bringing in and planting on our soil the pauper labor of Europe may be checked, and why they are asking for this legislation.

I do not see, sir, how any one upon either side of this Chamber can square his conduct with his professions of a desire to promote the welfare, to improve the conditions, to contribute to the happiness of men who work with their hands in this country and refuse to check this influx of ignorant labor to compete with our workingmen and reduce them to a standard of living below that which they have at present.

There is one other consideration which seems to me of very serious importance. We do not have to wait now, sir, for men to be naturalized and accorded the suffrage before they can exercise a potent influence upon the most vital concerns of the whole people. It is only a few weeks since we have seen Great Britain face to face with a paralysis of industry, with imminent danger of famine, with a condition which had thrown out of employment more than 2,000,000 of the working people who themselves were not on strike, but who were thrown out of employment because the coal supply to keep going the industries in which they worked had failed. That situation was brought about by a vote of the miners of coal.

But a few years ago, sir, we ourselves were confronted with a situation—not so widespread and not so imminent in its danger, but serious enough—when the coal miners of Pennsylvania stopped absolutely the supply of anthracite coal for the country. That stoppage of that great supply necessary to the comfort, necessary to keep going the furnace fire and the kitchen fire, to keep going the manufactories which employed labor, to keep going the wages of labor, was brought about by a vote of the miners in the anthracite regions of Pennsylvania.

Mr. President, I do not in the remotest degree touch upon the question of right or wrong, wisdom or unwisdom, expediency or inexpediency of such a vote. At times it may be justified; at times it may not. It even may be a close and doubtful question as to whether the men who mine the coal or the men who work in any other of the great basic industries upon which our great structure of production and commerce is built up should vote to stop.

Surely, sir, it is of vital importance to the people of the United States that the men who are to consider that question, the men who are to vote whether they will go on to furnish or will cease to furnish the supplies necessary to the continuance of our industries at large, to the continuance of the supply of the necessities and comforts of life—surely it is of vital importance to us that the men who are to cast that vote shall be men instructed, men who are able to read, men who are able to get into touch with the sentiments of American life, with the principles of American institutions. Yet we find by the report of the Immigration Commission that it is into those basic industries upon which all our industries depend that these new arrivals from southeastern Europe go. They go to the point where ignorant, uninstructed action may do the greatest damage, to the point where instructed and wise action is of the greatest consequence. Here is what the commission says:

"A large proportion of the southern and eastern European immigration of the past 25 years has entered the manufacturing and mining industries of the Eastern and Middle Western States, mostly in the capacity of unskilled laborers. There is no basic industry in which they are not largely represented, and in many cases they compose more than 50 per cent of the total number of persons employed in such industries."

And to-morrow, sir, the question whether the workers in our mills shall continue to have employment, the question whether our furnace fires shall continue alive, whether the ordinary necessities of life shall be cut off, is liable to be determined by the vote of the miners, more than 50 per cent of whom, according to this report, may be unable to read and write.

I have read the statement from the report of the commission. The commission says:

"There is no basic industry in which they are not largely represented"—

That is, these unskilled laborers from southeastern Europe—

"in which they are not largely represented, and in many cases they compose more than 50 per cent of the total number of persons employed in such industries."

I do not think it is a fact that a majority of the miners in any part of the country are illiterate, but I say that unless we put some check on this immigration we are feeding into the body of men who are engaged in these basic industries, the continuance of which is necessary for all other industries, a continual stream of men whose minds are closed to the principles and the sentiments of our American institutions and our American civilization. I think that this consideration is powerful in its persuasion toward the adoption of such a test as it is now proposed to strike out from the bill.

THE UNION LEAGUE CLUB OF NEW YORK CITY INDORSES THE ILLITERACY TEST.

Whereas the Republican Party has declared in its national platforms of 1896 and 1900 that, in the interest of the American workingman, it favors a more effective restriction of cheap labor from foreign lands; and

Whereas many of the immigrants now landing in this country are of a less desirable class than those of former years; and

Whereas the coming of great numbers of such class tends, by the changing of standards of living and the lowering of public ideals, to undermine our national institutions: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Union League Club of New York City, That we heartily indorse the attitude of the present national administration and of the present commissioner of immigration of the port of New York, as manifested in the more efficient enforcement of existing laws.

Resolved, That we demand in every port of entry in the United States a strict enforcement of that provision of the present law which excludes "all persons who are found to be and are certified by the examining surgeon as being mentally and physically defective, such mental or physical defect being of a nature which may affect the ability of such alien to earn a living."

Resolved, That we favor such amendments to the present law as will authorize the deportation of any immigrant who becomes a public charge for any cause within one year of landing, and as will permit the deportation within one year after landing of such persons as were, in fact, at time of landing, paupers, or likely to become public charges, even though such disability was not detected at the time of said landing.

Resolved, That we urge upon Congress the enactment of laws which will secure the selection of a better class of immigrants by the exclusion of such adult aliens as are unable to read a language or dialect and of such as have not in their possession sufficient money to assure their support while seeking employment; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, the Speaker of the National House of Representatives, and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress of the State of New York.

THE ILLITERACY TEST WOULD KEEP OUT ALIEN CRIMINALS.

Mr. PATTEN. The illiteracy test is not proposed as a means of excluding criminals, it is not offered as a substitute for existing laws debarring criminals, but as an additional selective and restrictive measure, and on the ground that, for an enlightened democracy such as we have, on the average, the man who can read and write is more likely to be better fitted for American citizenship than the one who can not. If the steamships can not bring illiterates they will bring literates. Of course an elementary—even a high school—education is no absolute guaranty against rascality. The test is proposed merely as another means of sifting out the more unassimilative aliens. It would seem, as Commissioner General Sargent argued, that the man who can read, write, and figure must necessarily be better equipped for the struggle for existence—better prepared for American citizenship, and more likely to take up with our standards and ideals, else our whole public-school system is wrong. There are, of course, individual cases of illiterate persons making excellent citizens, but statistics show, as one would expect, that it is the illiterate who generally has criminal propensities, is averse to country life, settles down in the crowded quarters, takes no permanent interest in the country, lacks a knowledge of a trade, has lower standards of life, a less ambition to seek a better——

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. He may not have had any chance to learn.

Mr. PATTEN. That is true; but the public-school system, the forms of government, and other institutions are reflections of capacities, characteristics, etc., of people. The late Commissioner General of Immigration, Mr. Frank P. Sargent, in one of his annual reports, expressed a decidedly contrary opinion, and argued that a rudimentary education certainly could not be a handicap in the struggle for existence, and the inference I drew from his statements was that it was decidedly desirable, and that our public-school system was all right.

[Part of memorial adopted by both branches of Vermont State Legislature and approved by the governor.]

VERMONT LEGISLATURE MEMORALIZES CONGRESS FOR ENACTMENT OF ILLITERACY TEST AND SENATE BILL 3175.

Whereas Congress, February 21, 1907, created an Immigration Commission composed of three Senators, three Members of the House of Representatives, and three persons appointed by the President, for the purpose of making a careful and searching investigation into the entire question of immigration both in this country and abroad, and after several years painstaking investigation at a cost of a million dollars, said commission has issued its exhaustive report of 40 volumes and urgently recommends the passage of a measure which will restrict the admission of those less likely to become desirable citizens; and

Whereas the commission, with a single dissenting opinion, recommends the reading and writing test as the one best calculated to restrict undesirable immigration; and

Whereas the Hon. WILLIAM P. DILLINGHAM, senior Senator from Vermont, as chairman of the Immigration Commission, introduced a bill containing the illiteracy test, and said bill has passed the Senate and is now pending before the House of Representatives under the title of the Dillingham-Burnett bill: Therefore

Resolved, That the congressional delegation from Vermont is urgently requested to advocate and aid in the passage of any immigration bill containing the illiteracy test.

[Extract from 1912 Annual Report of the United States Commissioner General, Hon. D. J. Keefe.]

COMMISSIONER GENERAL OF IMMIGRATION, HON. D. J. KEEFE, RECOMMENDS ILLITERACY TEST IN HIS ANNUAL REPORT FOR 1912.

While I have not heretofore opposed the insertion in the law of what has come to be known as the "illiteracy test," I have not expressed positive approval of it, preferring that what seemed to me to be the ideal test, viz, a very high and rigidly enforced rule with respect to moral, mental, and physical soundness of applying aliens should be inserted in the statute and given far-reaching effect by appropriate regulations. During the past two years my attention has been directed to numerous arguments, both favorable and unfavorable to the illiteracy test, and I have been so much impressed with those of the former character that gradually I have come to believe that the situation in the United States produced by immigration heretofore comparatively unrestricted (which situation has been described in previous reports of the bureau, as well as in the comprehensive report of the Immigration Commission recently published) demands that some method be adopted by which the influx of foreigners so unduly large as to be unhealthful may be so extensively reduced in actual numbers as materially to affect the existing purely economic phase of the proposition. It seems to have been shown quite clearly that this result would be accomplished by the illiteracy test. Of course, it is true that this is not the ideal method of sifting immigration so as to exclude none except altogether undesirable and admit none except altogether desirable aliens; that must be accomplished, if at all, by such tests as can be devised to apply to their moral, mental, and physical qualifications. But undoubtedly the illiteracy test would accomplish the immediately important purpose of materially reducing the volume of immigration and would principally reach aliens of a generally undesirable character.

An individual alien, although unable to read and write, might prove to be a valuable acquisition to the country; but when immigration is considered in larger proportions the case of this individual would sink into insignificance. Take, for instance, a thousand aliens who are literate and compare them with a thousand who are illiterate. While individual exceptions to the rule, as already indicated, would undoubtedly be found, there can be little question that among the latter thousand there would be a great many more undesirable from the moral, mental, and physical standpoint than among the former thousand. Another consideration which impresses me with respect to the illiteracy test is the fact that as a rule the literate alien generally is better qualified than the illiterate to acquire a knowledge of and respect for our political and social institutions and may, therefore, be more readily assimilated. I believe, however, that if the illiteracy test should be adopted for the purpose of immediately effecting a material reduction in the volume of immigration the standard with respect to moral, mental, and physical qualifications should simultaneously be raised.

[Editorial from the Boston Evening Transcript, Nov. 16, 1912.]

SOUND VIEWS ON IMMIGRATION.

There has come to the Settler's desk a little pamphlet by Theodore Marburg, Esq., of Baltimore, which sets forth in a straightforward manner the menace of foreign immigration. So much sentimental sophistry is put out concerning this subject nowadays that it is a peculiar satisfaction to come upon a discussion that is thoroughly sane.

The reality of the immigration peril is patent to every unprejudiced observer of American life. Immigration of the quantity and the quality that has been coming to this country in recent years involves grave dangers. Regarded from an economic, a social, or a political viewpoint, its effects are bad. It causes economic disturbance, overcrowding the labor market, and depressing the wage rate. It multiplies, complicates, and aggravates the problems of social reform. It subjects American institutions to a severe strain and endangers the success of the democratic experiment.

The political danger is emphasized especially by Mr. Marburg: "We owe it to the world to continue to make this experiment successful. If shutting out immigrants seems unfair, it is unfair in a bigger way to permit the overcrowding which will place a strain upon our institutions. The advantages of slower growth will be manifold. The older the Government the deeper will it become rooted in the affections of the people. The slower the change of conditions we are compelled to meet, the greater will be the opportunity to accommodate ourselves to such change and to do it successfully. We have a right to exercise a choice not only in the character and health of the individuals we admit, but in the races we admit. It might be well to try, for a generation at least, the experiment of limiting the numbers of immigrants, declaring definitely how many we will receive from each of the European peoples, and giving a decided preference to the hardy northern blood. * * * What use is there in multiplying a population if you are going to subject vast numbers to a life in factory and mine? It is not by growth in numbers that the world is moved forward, but by growth in kind. Ever a higher type living under conditions of greater social justice, that is an aim worth striving for."

[Editorial from the New York Herald, Apr. 13, 1912.]

TROUBLE AHEAD.

We call attention in the news columns this morning to the flood of immigrants now pouring into the country through the port of New York. They are coming in larger numbers than ever before. In March 83,654, a record number for that month, passed inspection. So far in April 6,000 more have entered than for the first half of April last year.

Some 3,000 a day, often more, have to be examined by the immigration inspectors. Almost needless to say, it is impossible to determine properly in the time that can be given each of them the fitness of any such number for entrance. At the very most 1,800 can be cared for with the quarters and the staff at the command of the commissioner of immigration.

Hence, a large number of most undesirable persons are being necessarily admitted. We pointed out in the Herald months ago, with the warning that immigration would probably be higher than ever this year, that at the present time nearly two-thirds of the inmates of the public insane asylums of the metropolitan district are of foreign birth. The ratio will be even higher after this. Insanity is only one of the undesirable qualities in such a heterogeneous mass. It may be fairly taken as an index of what can be confidently expected from our shortsighted policy.

This must stop. We need better immigration laws, but above all we need at once more inspectors to enforce our existing laws properly. We are laying up physical, mental, and moral trouble for our people. Who is to blame?

AN ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BETTER FITS FOR THE STRUGGLE FOR EXISTENCE AND FOR PARTICIPATION IN OUR PUBLIC AFFAIRS.

APRIL 12, 1912.

Senator F. M. SIMMONS,
Washington, D. C.:

I see by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that you are to speak next Monday on your illiteracy-test amendment to the immigration bill (S. 3175) now pending before the Senate, and I beg to say that there are over 400,000 members of the above patriotic society that have been urging for several years with more and more emphasis the adoption of such a test for adult aliens.

The membership feels that there is quite too much illiteracy in the country already, and that we ought to require of our own, by means of compulsory school-attendance laws, that they be able to read and write—as well as of foreigners entering the country—on the ground that a rudimentary education better fits one for the struggle for life and for citizenship in this country.

IMMIGRATION—UP TO CONGRESS.

(Resolution 77, passed at the annual convention held at Toronto, Ontario, Nov., 1909.)

Whereas the illiteracy test is the most practical means for restricting the present stimulated influx of cheap labor, whose competition is so ruinous to the workers already here, whether native or foreign; and

Whereas an increased head tax upon steamships is needed to provide better facilities, to more efficiently enforce our immigration laws, and to restrict immigration; and

Whereas the requirement of some visible means of support would enable immigrants to find profitable employment; and

Whereas the effect of the Federal bureau of distribution is to stimulate foreign immigration: Therefore be it

Resolved, By the American Federation of Labor in twenty-ninth annual convention assembled, That we demand the enactment of the illiteracy test, the money test, an increased head tax, and the abolition of the distribution bureau; and be it further

Resolved, That we favor heavily fining the foreign steamships for bringing debarable aliens where reasons for debarment could have been ascertained at the time of sale of ticket.

The final inning of the tug of war over immigration has now begun. In this contest tremendous forces are engaged. On the side of America are the upholders of two distinctive American sentiments, the maintenance of the American standard of living for our wageworking classes and the maintenance of American institutions as they are, unimpaired through the financial degradation of the working classes. On the proimmigration side is the powerful immigration machine, composed of the transocean combine, with all its thousands of agents and other innumerable parasites, the bankers, padrones, etc., who are coining money out of the millions of immigrants coming in the course of years into this country from Europe.

The center of this tug of war has at last shifted to Congress. No longer is the discussion indefinite, casual, or partisan or without an immediate object, conducted through the press and other insufficient agencies of information and debate. No longer, either, is it backed up merely by individual impressions or the partial investigations heretofore promoted by various private institutions. The Federal Government undertook four years ago the solution of the immigration question through scientific means. It set out to ascertain the undeniable facts and after three full years of research its commission has brought forward no less than 40 volumes on the subject, covering every possible phase. Its recommendations it has brought forward in concise form in a separate pamphlet.

A reading of these recommendations confirms the facts of the case as they have been accepted by the American Federation of Labor after the serious study its members had given the question for decades. The local, and then the international unions, and finally the annual conventions of the American Federation of Labor itself, have had immigration up for consideration as one of the principal labor topics on literally thousands of occasions. The membership as a whole, from upholding the sentiments the great majority once entertained, namely, that this country could go on indefinitely absorbing the entire possible stream of immigration, have reluctantly, in view of the facts, passed over to the sway of the sentiment that their own good heartedness toward the immigrant and the laborers of the Old World was being exploited by large employers for the purpose of reducing wages as well as by the steamship combine and its myriad of parasites for the sake of their own profits. At last the great body of the American industrial wageworkers have come to see one fact above others, which is that the immigrants are assimilated in America through the wageworking class. This means that the American-born wage earners and the foreign wage earners who have been here long enough to aspire to American standards are subjected to the ruinous competition of an unending stream of men freshly arriving from foreign lands who are accustomed to so low a grade of living that they can underbid the wage earners established in this country and still save money. Whole communities, in fact whole regions, have witnessed a rapid deterioration in the mode of living of their working classes consequent on the incoming of the swarms of lifelong poverty-stricken aliens. Entire industries have seen the percentage of newly arrived laborers rising until in certain regions few American men can at present be found among the unskilled.

By the commission's report it is shown that in many communities as high as 50 and even 70 per cent of the children in the public schools are the offspring of foreign fathers. This remarkable change in America, it must be kept in mind, is almost wholly in the wage-working class. It was recognized by our wageworkers in many parts of the country that this radical change in population was taking place, and hence delegates to the trade-union conventions began some years ago to give their testimony as to the need of restriction of the evidently assisted, or artificially promoted, immigration. Opposition to those who supported these views brought about a continual sifting and searching for the truth, as it affected trade-unionism and the general wage level.

At work in advance of the investigators of the Immigration Commission were the representatives of labor as most deeply interested investigators in the cause of labor. Not only in a general way, but most strikingly in certain occupations and in certain districts of the country, what had been brought home to trade-unionists as going on through immigration was the rapid change in the membership of the unions as well as in population. In no country on the face of the globe do such rapid transitions in industry and in population take place as in ours. Therefore, in time the general opinion among union men on immigration had come to be such as was expressed in the resolution passed at the Toronto convention.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the pamphlet which I hold in my hand, prepared by Mr. Max J. Kohler, of New York City, one of the delegates on civil and religious rights of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PRESIDENT TAFT'S VIEWS ON IMMIGRATION.

[Extract from a speech delivered by the President at Cambridge Springs, Pa., on Saturday, Oct. 26, 1912, at the dedication of a Polish college.]

I can not close without some reference to the question of immigration and the attitude that ought to be taken by the lovers of our country. I am one of those who believe that America is greatly better in her present condition, and will have still greater advantage in the future, because of the infusion into our body, politic and social, of the sturdy peasantry and the better educated classes who have come to us from the nations of Europe. In the actual development of the country it would have been impossible for us to have done what has been done in the construction of railroads, in the development of our farms, and in the establishment of our industries, had we not had the strong arms and the steady heads of those who have come to us from continental Europe. Assuming that the foundation of our country and the original people here were from the islands of Great Britain and Ireland, and treating the foreign question as one now of immigration from continental Europe, I repeat that I do not share in the fear that our citizenship is ultimately likely to suffer by the coming from other continental countries for the purpose of permanent settlement of any of the peoples who are now coming. We have a right to have, and ought to have, immigration laws that shall prevent our having thrown upon us the undesirable members of other communities, like the criminals, imbeciles, the insane, and the permanently disabled, but we have a vast territory here not yet filled, in the development of which we need manual labor of a constant and persistent kind, and I think we have shown in the past, as we shall show in the future, that our system of education is sufficiently thorough and sufficiently attractive to those who come here that they of all others avail themselves of it with promptness and success. I have an abiding faith in the influence of our institutions upon all who come here, no matter how lacking in education they may be, if they have the sturdy enterprise to leave home and to come out to this country to seek their fortunes. It is not the uneducated who scoff at education—they value it. They sacrifice everything to enable their children to obtain that which they were denied. The second generation of a sturdy but uneducated peasantry, brought to this country and raised in an atmosphere of thrift and hard work, and forced by their parents into school to obtain an instrument for self-elevation, has always contributed to the strength of our people, and they will continue to do so. The difficulty that they do not speak our language makes the process of amalgamation slower perhaps, but it does not prevent it.

I am proud of our country that we have had its doors swinging easily open for the industrious peoples of other countries that have sought ours for greater happiness and quicker development, and he would be blind indeed who would deny that a substantial part of our progress is due to this policy of generosity toward those who are seeking the atmosphere of freedom and the land of equal opportunity.

PRESIDENT ELECT WILSON'S VIEWS ON IMMIGRATION.

23 WEST STATE STREET, TRENTON, N. J.,
October 21, 1912.

DR. CYRUS ADLER, Philadelphia, Pa.

MY DEAR DR. ADLER: * * * I am in substantial agreement with you about the immigration policy which the country ought to observe. I think that this country can afford to use and ought to give opportunity to every man and woman of sound morals, sound mind, and sound body who comes in good faith to spend his or her energies in our life, and I should certainly be inclined, so far as I am concerned, to scrutinize very jealously any restrictions that would limit that principle in practice. * * *

Cordially and sincerely, yours, WOODROW WILSON.

THE INJUSTICE OF A LITERACY TEST FOR IMMIGRANTS.

The Dillingham bill (S. 3175), which has passed the Senate, and the Burnett bill (H. R. 22527), which has been reported to the House of Representatives, represent a radical departure from the historical policy of our Government respecting immigration legislation. These bills, if enacted into law, would for the first time restrict immigration, whereas heretofore all legislation has been regulative. The method resorted to for the restriction of immigration in both of these bills is that of a literacy test, which is the sole provision of the Burnett bill.

In addition the Dillingham bill contains many radical innovations. Principal among these are (1) section 3, which provides for the exclusion of all persons not eligible to naturalization; (2) section 18, which requires that all aliens admitted to the United States shall be provided with certificates of admission and identity; (3) the abolition of the time limit of three years within which persons may be deported; and (4) the consolidation of the general immigration statutes with the Chinese-exclusion laws. There are other minor changes from existing law which tend to render the admission of aliens difficult when not excluding them entirely.

In support of the adoption of legislation to restrict immigration its advocates base their arguments in the main upon the report of the Immigration Commission. This is a report in forty-odd volumes, published in a limited edition, and there has been no opportunity for the commission to properly digest the material collected by it.

With respect to the opportunity for properly weighing the material gathered by the commission, its own editorial adviser, Prof. H. Parker Willis, has stated (Survey, Jan. 7, 1911, p. 571):

"With so much actually collected in the way of detailed data, and with but scant time in which to summarize these data; lacking, moreover, a sufficient number of trained writers and statisticians to study the information acquired and to set it down with a due proportion of properly guarded inference, it is a fact that much of the commission's information is still undigested and is presented in a form which affords no more than a foundation for the work of future inquirers. Such inquirers ought immediately to take the data in hand before they become obsolete and while they still represent existing conditions with substantial accuracy. Pending the results of such inquiry, however, those who would judge what the Immigration Commission has done and would fain find there material in support of their own preconceived ideas should be careful. And those who wish simply to appraise the work of the commission, with a view to forming some well-founded conclusion as to its meaning and its merit, must confine themselves to very narrow limits. They must recognize that only in the broadest way can conclusions as yet be drawn from the masses of statistics and the very general textual treatment to be presented in the reports of the commission. The question may be raised whether the commission would not have done better had it limited the field work more narrowly, and increased the relative amount of expenditure devoted to 'overhead work' in the office. It did not do so, however, and the result has been, instead of a small and finished study, a large and uncompleted body of data."

Nevertheless, a majority of the Immigration Commission recommend the restriction of immigration and the adoption of the literacy test as the most feasible method of accomplishing this purpose.

The Dillingham bill provides for the exclusion of all aliens over 16 years of age who can not read and write the English or some other language, but permits an admissible alien to bring in or send for his wife, his children under 18 years of age, his parents or grandparents over 50 years of age, whether they can read and write or not. The test of an immigrant's ability to read and write is to be applied by requiring him to read and write 20 to 25 words of the Constitution of the United States.

The Burnett bill excludes all aliens over 16 years of age who are unable to read English or the language or dialect of some other country and permits an admissible alien to bring in or send for his father or grandfather over 55 years of age, his wife, his mother, his grandmother, his unmarried or widowed daughter, whether able to read or not.

It will be noted that the Dillingham bill requires reading and writing and admits only those children of an immigrant who are under 18 years of age, whereas the Burnett bill requires only reading and permits an immigrant to bring in or send for his daughters, irrespective of age, though sons over 16 years of age will be excluded, thus dividing a family.

Both the Burnett bill and the Dillingham bill would in practice exclude almost all those females unable to read and write over 16 years of age coming alone and who may desire to enter domestic service.

If the provision for the literacy test contained in the Dillingham bill requiring words from the Constitution of the United States to be read and written is enacted into law, it would in practice exclude a great many to whom the terms of the Constitution are unknown and for many of which there is no equivalent in their language. They would find it impossible to read the language of the Constitution, and on this account the percentage of exclusions would probably be double that estimated.

On the face of the statistics compiled by the Commissioner General of Immigration 26 per cent of all immigrants would be excluded by the literacy test, though in the case of some immigrants more than 50 per cent would be excluded.

The following table shows the percentages of aliens over 14 years of age who would be excluded by a literacy test:

Abstract of reports of Immigration Commission (Vol. I, p. 99). Number and percentage of immigrants admitted to the United States who were 14 years of age or over and who could neither read nor write during the fiscal years 1899 to 1910, inclusive, by race or people.

But these figures are based on the voluntary statements of the immigrants, and a literacy test would in practical application probably keep out a great many more than the figures above given would indicate, especially with the Constitution as the test, since they are probably underestimates rather than overestimates, and they do not make allowance for the nervousness of the immigrant at the time of examination. Instead of excluding only 2 per cent of the Jews, as stated on page 6 of Report No. 259, Sixty-second Congress, second session, House of Representatives, the above statistics show that 26 per cent of the Jews would be excluded.

Recent statistics of Jewish immigrants to Galveston give the following figures:

	Per cent.
Of 1,333 males:
Can read Yiddish and Russian	53.89
Can read Yiddish only	24
Can read Russian only	2.83
Can read Yiddish, Russian, and Hebrew	.71
Can not read any language	12.55
Of 220 females: Can not read any language	37.73

These are in the main the victims of Russian religious persecution, to whom the schools are closed on account of the faith they profess. The recent volume by Mary Antin, "The Promised Land," shows from her personal experience that to the Jews of Russia the United States typifies, above all else, the land where their children may have the benefits of education denied them by the Russian Government.

[Extract from an address by Hon. Charles Nagel, Secretary of Commerce and Labor, delivered on Jan. 18, 1911, at New York.]

I am on record as being unqualifiedly opposed to the illiteracy test. It is not a matter of sentiment. You may indulge sentiment in an individual case, but you can not indulge sentiment in governmental policy. You must know why you come to your conclusion. I think I know why I have come to mine. I care more for the sound body and the sound mind and the straight look out of the eye and the ability and the willingness to work as a test than for any other test that can be given.

I have been asked whether illiteracy stands in the way of assimilation. I say unqualifiedly, in my opinion it does not. On the contrary, to be entirely frank about it, I believe that the ability to read and write a foreign language, aided by your foreign press in this country, tends to perpetuate the spirit of colonization longer than it can be if a sound mind and body comes in without the ability to read and write and is forced of necessity to resort to our own language.

And on October 9, 1912, in a speech at Cooper Union, Secretary Nagel said:

"I am bound to admit that I can not support that law, broadly speaking. I believe it is intended as a piece of legislation for wholesale exclusion, and I don't believe in that kind of legislation. If you want to exclude certain nationalities, say so, and meet the issue squarely. I don't believe literacy is a fair test for the admission of an immigrant. I will say again what I said a year ago, that I care more for the sound body and the sound mind and the straight look out of the eye and the ability and willingness to work as a test than any other test that can be given."

[From the Annual Report of the Commissioner General of Immigration, 1909, p. 5.]

* * * It can not be stated as a hard and fast rule that the desirability of an alien is always to be measured by his ability to read and write.

[From the Annual Report of the Commissioner General of Immigration, 1910, p. 5.]

There may be some merit in the proposals to fix a "literacy test" and to increase the head tax; but, as was explained in last year's report, neither of these projects is likely to be as efficacious as their advocates think; for the first is not in the direction, necessarily, of raising the general standard and is not as practical as it looks on the surface, and the second, under the existing system of lending money or selling passage on credit, would to some extent increase opportunities for the exploitation of aliens, and bring many of the lowest element into the country in a more impoverished state than they now come.

[Extracts from the views of Mr. Bennet, of New York, and Mr. O'Connell, of Massachusetts, House of Representatives, Report No. 1956, part 2, Sixty-first Congress, third session.]

* * * The educational test * * * will keep out some able-bodied men and women of irreproachable moral character and filled with the desire to work, but who have not had early educational advantages; and will admit practically every foreign-born criminal who has misused early advantages, and also that small but dangerous class who come to this country with no intention of engaging in an honest occupation, but of maintaining themselves through the exploitation of their fellow-countrymen. Education is the principal means through which this class obtains the confidence of its victims.

We do not, however, principally oppose the literacy test because of its being a sham, nor entirely because it keeps out many who should be admitted and lets in some who should be debarred, but because the reasons given for restriction are slight and those for selection do not exist. It is true that the Immigration Commission reported that in some basic industries there was a surplus of labor, which indicated that there was an overplus of unskilled laborers in the industries of the country, but the commission unanimously recommended that so far as restriction was concerned it should be applied to unskilled laborers either single or coming here leaving their families behind them. The sole recommendation of the Immigration Commission in regard to the educational test was that it was the most feasible, from which we assume the majority meant that it was the easiest to secure, and even in this we think that that majority was in error. As to the character of the immigrants who have come to this country in the past 25 years, the Immigration Commission—nine men of differing views—reported unanimously that conviction for crime is no more common among the new immigrants than among the native born; that they are far less the victims of disease than any other class of immigrants of whom statistics have ever been kept; that they are rarely found among the victims of alcoholism; that pauperism is relatively at a minimum among them; that in the most congested blocks of cities having the largest foreign-born populations five-sixths of the homes of the foreign-born are well kept and two-fifths are immaculate—and this on the report of women investigators; that their children attend school in large numbers; and that such new immigrants are much more rarely found in the insane asylum than their predecessors.

While we concur in the evident opinion of the commissioner general that the literacy test would not be effective, there is no question about its effectiveness concerning one class, and that is the illiterate aliens who in prior years have been admitted to this country and who are not yet naturalized. In past years, when times have become hard in this country, the alien who had but recently arrived, who was an unmarried man, or who had a family in the country of his birth, went back at the first sign of economic distress, thus relieving this country of any question as to his support. The most recent and impressive example was had during the years of 1907 and 1908, and these returning aliens went cheerfully because they understood that when there was a demand again for labor in this country they could return.

The moment the literacy test is enacted every alien in this country who can not comply with it, and who has the slightest desire to attach himself to our country, will be attached to this country by the fact that if he once goes out he can not certainly come in, for even the method of administration of the new test is uncertain. And, therefore, if another period of economic distress should come, we would not have the benefit of the economic relief which we had in the recent years through the emigration of those who were least competent to succeed. This would make any subsequent panic or business depression much more disastrous and the recovery much more slow.

It has been our boast since the days of Roger Williams, Lord Baltimore, and William Penn that this country was the refuge for the oppressed. On that sentiment, in large part, has been built up our national idea of free America, and because of that sentiment we have attracted here the ambitious of every nation. The free and unrestricted immigration of the able-bodied has not injured our country in the past, but has helped it, and the maintenance of our shores as an asylum for the oppressed has made us an example for liberty everywhere and a continued menace to tyranny. We can not afford, after our emphatic success as exponents of liberty and freedom, to adopt at this time any measure based upon an avowal of our belief that lack of opportunity of any alien people has made them our inferiors, nor can we afford to close our doors to fugitives from oppression and injustice still unfortunately existing. The Russian-Jewish mothers who have seen their husbands and their children killed and maimed in the pogroms have just as much right in this country in the twentieth century as the Puritan and the Pilgrim had in the seventeenth. The Pole and the Finn who has seen his country enslaved have the same rights to come here to freedom and liberty as had William Penn and his Quakers.

The denationalized Roumanian Jew, proscribed because of race and religion in the country of his birth, has the moral right to enjoy our country's Constitution guaranteeing religious freedom. The family of the murdered Armenian Christian from Asia Minor can not be barred without a reversal of all our previous professions and practice, and the South Italian, coming to this country to escape the burden of medieval landlordism, puts his claim on exactly the same grounds as the Irish immigrant of the fifties. In the past the peoples coming to us because of similar reasons have risen among us to standing and success, and there is no reason to believe that those now coming will not do so also. The rigid bill, ordered to be reported, against which we protest, would bar out, irrespective of every other consideration, the people of any of the classes we have mentioned. * * *

[Extract from the views of Representatives Gustav Küstermann, ADOLPH J. SABATH, and HENRY M. GOLDFOGLE, presented to the House of Representatives on Jan. 28, 1911. House of Representatives, Sixty-first Congress, third session, Report No. 1956, part 2.]

The application of a literacy test would serve to exclude from admission some able-bodied men and women of good moral character, capable of self-support, and industriously inclined, but who owing to the unfortunate and in many instances deplorable conditions existing in their native lands have not had the advantage of education. In some of the countries from which many of the immigrants at which this bill is manifestly aimed come the opportunity of acquiring a knowledge of reading and writing is quite meager, while in some localities in those countries the opportunity for education is to such persons practically denied. And yet these people may be thoroughly honest, thrifty, and enterprising, industrious and self-supporting. When admitted to our shores, thousands and thousands of them avail themselves of the means of the popular and liberal school system almost everywhere afforded in the Union to get a rudimentary education, certainly at least sufficient to enable them to read and write.

In every large city—indeed in every city and almost every large town—men and women of foreign birth are to be found who, when they landed in this country could neither read nor write, have learned to do so in the schools, either the day or night schools, or obtained their knowledge through private instruction or, as is frequently the case, by being taught by their own children. Hundreds of thousands of such persons have become good farmers and mechanics, storekeepers and tradesmen, and successful and prosperous business men in different lines of industry and have contributed to the general welfare of the communities in which they settled. Myriads of such persons have made desirable acquisitions and became, after they had availed themselves of the opportunities this country affords, desirable citizens.

The children of immigrant parents, whether born here or abroad, quickly acquire an education in our schools. They exhibit eagerness to learn. Statistics demonstrate and experience proves that these children have great aptitude for study and make rapid and, in fact, remarkable educational progress. Very large numbers of them graduate from the schools with honor, many of them go to high schools and colleges. Yet their parents, if illiterate when knocking at the doors of our country for admission, would have been turned away under an educational test such as the bill reported proposes. * * *

We can not but regard the bill as un-American. It is opposed to all the traditions of our country and subversive of the broad principles we have always professed in the past. Our national boast has been that this country was the refuge for the downtrodden and the oppressed, who when coming in a healthy bodily and mental condition and with law-abiding spirit should be permitted to enter our gateway and to receive the hospitable shelter of our land. That sentiment in very large part has built up our national idea of free Americanism. We attract through its means the ambitious from other nations. The immigration of the able-bodied and honestly inclined has heretofore contributed in a very large degree to the greatness and prosperity of this Republic.

The maintenance of our land as an asylum for the oppressed and those who are compelled to escape from scenes of tyranny and persecution has made us an example for true liberty everywhere. In the line of our traditions and of the principles that have guided us in the past, through means of which our country stands preeminent as the land of liberty and freedom and equal opportunity, we can not afford to close our doors to those who still unfortunately suffer from oppression existing in foreign lands merely because they can not read, although otherwise qualified for such admission under existing law.

A radical departure from our national policy relating to immigration is here presented. Heretofore we have welcomed all who came to us from other lands, except those whose moral or physical condition or history threatened danger to our national welfare and safety. Relying upon the jealous watchfulness of our people to prevent injury to our political and social fabric, we have encouraged those coming from foreign countries to cast their lot with us and join in the development of our vast domain, securing in return a share in the blessings of American citizenship.

A century's stupendous growth, largely due to the assimilation and thrift of millions of sturdy and patriotic adopted citizens, attests the success of this generous and free-handed policy which, while guarding the people's interests, exacts from our immigrants only physical and moral soundness and a willingness and ability to work.

A contemplation of the grand results of this policy can not fail to arouse a sentiment in its defense, for however it might have been regarded as an original proposition and viewed as an experiment, its accomplishments are such that if it is to be uprooted at this late day its disadvantages should be plainly apparent and the substitute adopted should be just and adequate, free from uncertainties, and guarded against difficult or oppressive administration.

* * * * * * *

It is said, however, that the quality of recent immigration is undesirable. The time is quite within recent memory when the same thing was said of immigrants who, with their descendants, are now numbered among our best citizens.

* * * * * * *

The best reason that could be given for this radical restriction of immigration is the necessity of protecting our population against degeneration and saving our national peace and quiet from imported turbulence and disorder.

I can not believe that we would be protected against these evils by limiting immigration to those who can read and write in any language 25 words of our Constitution. In my opinion it is infinitely more safe to admit a hundred thousand immigrants who, though unable to read and write, seek among us only a home and opportunity to work than to admit one of those unruly agitators and enemies of governmental control, who can not only read and write, but delights in arousing by inflammatory speech the illiterate and peacefully inclined to discontent and tumult. Violence and disorder do not originate with illiterate laborers. They are rather the victims of the educated agitator. The ability to read and write as required in this bill in and of itself affords, in my opinion, a misleading test of contented industry and supplies unsatisfactory evidence of desirable citizenship or a proper apprehension of the benefits of our institutions. If any particular element of our illiterate immigration is to be feared for other causes than illiteracy, these causes should be dealt with directly instead of making illiteracy the pretext for exclusion to the detriment of other illiterate immigrants against whom the real cause of complaint can not be alleged.

[Extract from the remarks of Prof. Emily Greene Balch, Wellesley, College, author of Our Slavic Fellow Citizens, at meeting of the American Economic Association, Washington, D. C., Dec. 29, 1911.]

I do not include the illiteracy test among the measures that I desire, because I believe that it would affect exclusion along a line that would cause great hardship and that is not coincident with desirability and undesirability from our point of view. The minor who can not read Ruthenian and whose son came over from Harvard recently to consult me about the social work that he wants to do among his people in Pennsylvania was better stuff and better fitted to prosper in America than the unsuccessful "intellectual proletariat" who come to America to recoup their failure at home. Of course I am citing an exceptional case, but I believe that it is a fact that most Americans have an entirely false conception of the real significance of peasant illiteracy, which need not connote a lack of either energy or intelligence. The advantage, too, when here, of the ability to read and write in a foreign language is vastly overrated and the barrier that it sets up to assimilation is quite overlooked.

[Extract from the testimony of Miss Grace Abbott, director of the Immigrants' Protective League, Chicago, before the Committee on Immigration, House of Representatives, Jan. 11, 1912.]

I feel very strongly that it would be a great mistake to have a literacy test, because of the fact that there are many parts of Europe, notably in Galicia, and in parts of Russia and Hungary, as well as in southern Italy, where the possibility of getting an education is often extremely difficult. To exclude them would mean excluding a group of people who are eager to advance their position, who are willing to make great sacrifices in order to do it, but who happen to lack the ability to read and write. Great numbers of them supply that lack immediately upon coming here, and some come in order to supply it. The literacy test is no guaranty of character, and it seems to me its adoption would be a departure from American traditions which would not be beneficial to the American industrial situation.

[Extract from the testimony of Herman Stump, former Commissioner General of Immigration, before the Industrial Commission. Report of the Industrial Commission, Vol. XV, p. 6.]

My idea of immigration is this: We have, in my mind, the most skillful and best laboring class in the world; I think American workingmen are superior to others. It may be in some of the finer arts, where it takes long to acquire the skill that is required, it is not so, but for the production of work, with our improved machinery, we can beat the world. We are also an educated people. We want our sons to become our clerks, accountants, and business men, and find employment on the higher walks and occupations. We must necessarily have a certain other class to do our manual work, not menial exactly, but work which is honorable but at the same time of a lower order, which requires no skill or education. We want laborers upon our roads, upon our railroads, to clean our sewers and streets, and everything of that kind, and when you look around I think you will find that Americans are getting beyond that. A young able-bodied man who comes from a foreign land to settle here, with energy and willingness to work, is an acquisition to the country, and while we do not want him to occupy the positions which education would enable him to occupy, we want him to occupy the positions where it does not matter much whether he knows his A B C's or the simple rule of three or anything else.

[Extract from the testimony of Dr. Joseph H. Senner, former Commissioner of Immigration at the Port of New York, before the Industrial Commission. Report of the Industrial Commission, Vol. XV, p. 168.]

Based on my extended practical experience in charge of the paramount immigration station, I state that with the present number of inspection aisles and of available registry clerks, an introduction of the Lodge bill would much more than double the time for examination, and thereby double the hardships of steerage passengers. Its practical effect would, therefore, in my opinion, come dangerously near to an annihilation of immigration from nations of higher grade.

In order to dispose right here of the Lodge bill, I wish to state that our opposition to the same is principally based on our conviction that the proper time for such an educational test is at the time of naturalization and not upon admission to the country. We further regard its application to women as not only generally unjust, but practically also as a severe aggravation to our much vexed servant-girl question. We believe that its introduction for immigrants stands in a rather curious contrast with the present policy of expansion and its consequence as to wholesale reception of illiterate, if not savage, cocitizens. And finally, as a protective measure for American workingmen, the Lodge bill would be simply a farce, because the skilled laborer, whose competition organized labor wishes to restrict, could at any time pass any such examination.

[Extract from an editorial in New York Christian World, Mar. 18, 1911.]

Every year there are attempts to foist upon Congress bills to prevent immigration. Now it is one form of test now another. At present it is the so-called educational test that the perpetrators of these bills would insert in our immigration laws. As a matter of fact, there could hardly be a more deceptive test of real worth. The public-school system is not developed in many parts of Europe as it is here, or had not been until very recent years. Consequently many who have been coming here have not been what one might call scholars. Not always could they read and write. But these very ones have often been our best immigrants—strong, lusty, ambitious, good-natured, hard-working young men. The proposed educational test would shut out just these men who are tilling our farms, building our houses, laying our railroads and bridges, digging our coal from the earth. Many of them, under the stimulus of American surroundings, and since it is necessary, if they would have a share in the American Government, learn to read. The New York night schools are full of adults learning reading and other useful accomplishments. Their children learn with greatest avidity. The test of immigration should be health and morality. We can not afford to be the hospital for those Europe has made sick so long as Europe can afford to care for them, neither can we act as the penitentiary for her criminals; but apart from this we should welcome the immigrants freely, for they are our wealth.

[Extract from a protest against the proposed new immigration law, presented to the President by a delegation of citizens of Philadelphia, after conference with Speaker CANNON and the Pennsylvania congressional delegation, June 23, 1906.]

It is submitted that an immigrant should not be denied admission to our country if he is morally, physically, and mentally sound; that inability to read is not a fair measure of a man's moral worth nor of his economic value nor of his mental capacity; in short, it is not a fitting test of a man's honesty nor of his capacity to work with his hands nor of his ability to learn. Experience proves that moral soundness—simple honesty—is independent of intellectual culture; many men are morally sound notwithstanding their ignorance, and many others are morally unsound in spite of their education.

The ability to read is not a fair measure of a man's economic value, because experience proves that a man's capacity to earn a living is not necessarily dependent on intellectual culture.

* * * * * * *

A man's inability to read is not a fair test of his intelligence nor of his ability to learn. Many men are so circumstanced as to be precluded from learning how to read. This occurs in some cases, as in that of the Jewish inhabitants of Russia and Roumania, through governmental measures enforced for that very purpose, or, as in the case of other subjects of those Governments and of some of the inhabitants of other European lands, through hindering causes of a sociological nature. Such privation, though preventing a man from learning life through literature, does not prevent him from learning through experience; on the contrary, it quite frequently enhances this latter capacity, as numerous instances prove. It is therefore in the highest degree unreasonable to assume that a man's inability to read so strikingly impairs his value as a factor in the social economy that he must be completely debarred from taking part in it.

[Extract from an article on "Adjustment—not restriction," by Miss Grace Abbott, director of the Immigrants' Protective League, Chicago, Survey, Jan. 7, 1911, p. 529.]

As for the literacy test, it is difficult to find anything to recommend it as the best means, or even as a good means, of selecting our future citizens. What we desire is a character test, and the ability to read and write has never been regarded as a means of determining honesty or thrift. It is not even a test of ambition, for the immigrants come without the meager educational equipment because they have been given no opportunity to attend school in the countries from which they come. There is nothing which is so much the result of conditions over which the immigrant has no control as his ability to read and write and no deficiency which we are so well equipped to supply.

[Views of Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE, of Pennsylvania, House of Representatives, Report I, 1956, part 2, Sixty-first Congress, third session., Jan. 28, 1911.]

I am opposed to restriction of immigration by the illiteracy test, because the enforcement of such a test would tend to exclude worthy but uneducated immigrants who are willing to work, and of whom we stand in need, and would admit unworthy, educated immigrants who will not work and of whom we already have more than we need. In my judgment the desirable immigrant is the law-abiding worker who comes to this country in good faith, and the undesirable immigrant is the clever and educated schemer who, immediately upon his arrival, begins to find fault with our institutions.

[Extract from a speech of Hon. John C. Keliher, of Massachusetts, in the House of Representatives.]

I would ask you to follow me in your mind's eye under the bed of Boston Harbor, where Yankee enterprise and energy have bored an immense tunnel with an opening of sufficient size to permit of a double-tracked roadbed that brings inestimable joy to the denizens of a great section of the city in the form of convenience and comfort in reaching their homes from the business locality of the city. Could this work have been done as economically and with the dispatch that characterizes it if countless sons of sunny Italy had not been at hand? Go with me also into the subway we are now building in Boston, which will be a boon to all the people of that congested city. Toiling like beavers in a cut, the arch of which is scarcely 15 feet under the foundation of a 13-story building, can be seen by night and day myriad Italians toiling with no apparent thought of the great danger that ever hovers over this hazardous enterprise. It is safe to say that if a knowledge of the art of reading were the test demanded, rather than a sound body and willingness to swing a pick, there would be scarcely a mother's son of them engaged upon that great public project. Now, with what class of labor do these Italians interfere? The Irishman of to-day won't go into the trench unless it is to act as a boss; the German can not be induced to grasp a pick; the native American's physical make-up would bar him if he did not consider such menial labor beneath him; the Scandinavian finds ample demand for his service in more congenial branches; the Englishman answers the call of the mill proprietor, and the Scotchman goes with him.

If you shut the door to the dark-skinned son of Italy, where will we go to get the commodity which to us is an essential? The second generation, the son of the trench-digging Italian, won't follow his father's footsteps in those fields. He goes to school, absorbs book-learning quickly, and becomes imbued with a laudable ambition to better himself, and he does. You could no more coax him to wield a pick or handle a shovel than you could a Sioux Indian to imbibe water as a social beverage if whisky were available. This being so, if you bar out the Italian, Pole, and Hungarian, from whence are we to recruit our trench diggers?

[Extract from a speech of Hon. Bourke Cockran, of New York, in the House of Representatives.]

We who oppose the educational test believe the man who works with his hands, who is trained to efficiency in labor, is the desirable immigrant. The test that we wish to impose is one that will establish his ability and his willingness to work. * * * There is not a vicious man in any community outside of the poorhouse that is not more or less educated. He can not live by his wits rather than by his hands unless those wits are trained to some extent. Any unlettered immigrant shows that he must have virtuous instincts by the very fact that he comes here, for he can have no other purpose than to support life by his toil. I believe that it is more important that the applicant for admission to these shores should be made to show by the calloused palms of his hands that he is accustomed to work than to show glibness of tongue in meeting a literary test.

Mr. Chairman, let us consider in the light of ordinary experience what must happen to the man who comes here with nothing except the capacity to work. He must work to live, and he must work hard all day. No man who spends all the hours of the day in work can be vicious. Even if he had vicious propensities, he would have no time to indulge them. How can any man work from morning until night, increasing the production of the soil, and be other than a valuable citizen? The man who comes here where no mode of living is possible to him except by the work of his hands gives a bond to society that his life, if it be supported at all, must be spent in actively serving the common welfare. The unlettered man can live only by work. The educated man never wants to live by manual labor. If I were reduced to a choice—and I do not want to exclude anybody—but if I were reduced to a choice between the man who could stand this educational test and the man who could not—if I must exclude one or the other—it would be the man with such a literary qualification as the bill provides, for he may lead a vicious life, while the man who works with his hands can not lead other than a useful because an industrial life.

[Extract from an address made by Judge Nathan Bijur at the Massachusetts Reform Club, on Jan. 28, 1907.]

On the other hand, it is a matter of common knowledge that thousands of honest, sturdy, and intelligent natives of many European countries are illiterate, due solely to the lack of educational facilities in the country of their origin and residence. The fact is well known to every person having experience with this class of immigrants that in this country they rapidly acquire sufficient familiarity with our language to overcome their early disability.

CARDINAL'S RESIDENCE,
408 NORTH CHARLES STREET,
Baltimore, Md., May 5, 1912.

Rabbi WILLIAM ROSENAU,
1515 Eutaw Place, Baltimore, Md.

MY DEAR MR. ROSENAU: I am in receipt of your esteemed favor of the 3d instant, and in reply I beg to say that I am not in favor of any educational test as applied to immigrants desiring to enter the United States. Such a law, if passed, would, in my opinion, work great harm, for illiteracy is by no means always ignorance. If the immigrant is industrious and thrifty, he will make a useful citizen, whether he be literate or illiterate. The educated schemer is in more ways than one more dangerous than the honest workman, even though he be illiterate.

Very sincerely, yours,

J. CARDINAL GIBBONS,
Archbishop of Baltimore.

[Letter of President Eliot of Harvard University.]

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., February 14, 1910.

Hon. JOSEPH F. O'CONNELL,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: I beg leave to invite your attention to the following statement of the principles which should govern the national legislation on immigration:

(1) Our country needs the labor of every honest and healthy immigrant who has the intelligence and enterprise to come hither.

(2) Existing legislation is sufficient to exclude undesirable immigrants.

(3) Educational tests should not be applied at the moment of entrance to the United States, but at the moment of naturalization.

(4) The proper education test is capacity to read in English or in the native tongue, not the Bible or the Constitution of the United States, but newspaper items in some recent English or native newspaper which the candidate can not have seen.

(5) The attitude of Congress and the laws should be hospitable and not repellant.

The only questions which are appropriate are. Is he healthy, strong, and desirous of earning a good living? Many illiterates have common sense, sound bodies, and good characters. Indeed, it is not clear that education increases much the amount of common sense which nature gave the individual. An educational test is appropriate at the time when the foreigner proposes to become a voting citizen. He ought then to know how to read.

Very truly, yours,

CHARLES W. ELIOT.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO, February 28, 1910.

Hon. JOSEPH F. O'CONNELL,
House of Representatives, Washinton, D. C.

DEAR SIR: * * * I am not in favor of the restriction of immigration on the basis of the ability to read some European language. There is no doubt that the ability in question is desirable. At the same time the conditions of workingmen in the old country and their conditions in our country are radically different. If they are industrious and honest and thrifty, they will make useful citizens, and their children, having the opportunity of attending our free public schools, will acquire the needed education. * * *

GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY,
Washington, D. C., February 28, 1910.

Hon. JOSEPH F. O'CONNELL,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Regarding the educational test as a means of restricting immigration, on which question there is an agitation to report out a bill, I beg leave to submit the following:

(1) The educational test should be applied to the voter, not to the immigrant.

(2) The laws restraining immigration are sufficiently drastic, and if put into execution will safeguard the country. Those who have openly taught immorality and favored anarchy should be excluded rather than the illiterates.

An illiterate artisan is not necessarily an ignorant or undesirable immigrant. Our whole past history proves that such men may serve the country in their proper sphere.

Very truly, yours,

JOSEPH HIMMEL, President.

Hon. JOSEPH F. O'CONNELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have your communication of February 23, with the inclosed copy of the letter of ex-President Eliot, of Harvard University, on the subject of the admission of immigrants into the United States.

I fully concur in the views expressed by President Eliot, and I do not think I can express them in clearer, more forcible, or appropriate language.

Very truly, yours, J. G. SCHURMAN.

MY DEAR MR. O'CONNELL:

* * * * * * *

(1) Does not the country need the toil of every intelligent, active, and moral worker who comes to us?

(2) The proper time for the educational test is when the immigrant seeks to be naturalized.

(3) Let existing legislation be enforced before new laws are enacted. The wise regulations already made, if enforced, would bar out undesirable subjects.

(4) There are millions of acres in the West waiting for these farm-loving immigrants. I am sure that you will insist upon these truths.

Ever yours, sincerely,

T. I. GASSON, S. J.

RATIO OF FOREIGN BORN TO NATIVE BORN UNCHANGED.

Much is made by restrictionists of the supposed enormous influx of foreigners, and especially of the change in the racial character of immigrants. For their purposes they characterize the immigration which arrived here before 1890 as the "old" immigration and that which has arrived since then as the "new."

But there has been practically no change in the ratio between foreign born and native born, as is demonstrated by the following table:

Census year.	Total population considered.	Native born.		Foreign born.
		Number.	Per cent of total.	Number.	Per cent of total.
1860	31,443,321	27,304,624	86.8	4,138,697	13.2
1870	38,558,371	32,991,142	85.6	5,567,229	14.4
1880	50,155,783	43,475,840	86.7	6,679,943	13.3
1890	63,069,756	53,761,652	85.2	9,308,104	14.8
1900	76,303,387	65,843,302	86.3	10,460,085	13.7
1910	91,972,266	78,629,766	84.3	13,342,500	15.7

The change in the source of our immigration is due to the simple fact that in the countries from which the United States before 1890 drew the bulk of its immigration there has been an enormous industrial and economic expansion. And this, as is well known, is particularly true of Germany, which has become a country of immigration instead of one of emigration. Owing to the industrial development of that country, so many agricultural laborers have been drawn into skilled industries that great numbers of unskilled laborers are attracted from Austria-Hungary, Russia, and Italy—the same countries that supply the United States with the bulk of its unskilled labor.

The characterization of the present-day immigration as coming from a source out of harmony with the spirit of American institutions and not readily assimilable on that account can be matched almost word for word by a similar characterization of the "old" immigration dating back to the beginning of the nineteenth century. (See Report of Industrial Commission, 1901, Vol. XV, pp. 449–491, and Hearings before House Committee on Immigration, 62d Cong., 2d sess., pp. 95–98.)

[Speech of Senator JAMES A. O'GORMAN delivered in the Senate on Apr. 18, 1912.]

I am opposed to the imposition of an educational test upon those born in foreign countries who desire to come to the United States. I think it would be regrettable to exclude thousands of able-bodied, honest, and industrious men, otherwise desirable, who might not be able to meet the requirements of this proposed qualification.

It is said in behalf of this amendment that the large number of foreign born who pass through the ports of the United States enter into competition with American labor. That is true; it has always been true; it was as true a generation ago as it is to-day; and yet in its results the entire country has been benefited.

This proposal to exclude foreigners has no novelty. This Republic had but completed the first decade of its existence when, in the administration of John Adams, the same sentiments which I have heard expressed on this floor to-day and yesterday were uttered against the foreign born. To discourage immigration, as far back as 1798, under the influence of the Federalist Party, the period of naturalization was extended from 5 to 14 years, and during the same session of Congress and under the same influences the odious alien and sedition laws were passed, which conferred upon the then President of the United States the power to exclude at his will any foreigner found upon American territory. It is to the honor of our institutions and to the glory of the Republic that the shame and infamy of that legislation was wiped out when the Democrats of this country elected Thomas Jefferson to the Presidency.

From time to time in every succeeding generation there have been those who were opposed to the admission of the foreign born into the brotherhood of the Republic. The same arguments were used then that are used now. Within the memory of men in this Chamber it was said of the races which are now glorified and alluded to as the "old immigration" that they could not be assimilated with the American body politic. That those accusations in those days were unfounded has been demonstrated by the experience of the American people. That the aspersions now cast upon the races from southern and eastern Europe are equally unfounded will be established in time.

We are not crowded on this continent. The population of all Europe might be placed in the single State of Texas, and there would be less congestion than now prevails on the Continent of Europe. If there ever come a time when the American people may deem it necessary to impose restrictions upon desirable immigration, the time will not come in our generation; and if a restriction should be required, if it should be deemed wise as a national policy to discourage immigration, let us proceed upon a safe and sound theory; let us make the qualification that of character and not educational attainments.

Our country is enriched every time an honest, able-bodied man enters the United States. Our institutions are threatened, our safety imperiled, when we become careless respecting those who, possessing an intellectual qualification, are devoid of that which is far more essential, a character qualification. Washington himself spoke of the need of preserving the morality of our people. With this proposed test you ignore the morality of your citizenship; you ignore the question as to whether in character the man is worthy to take his place in this great Republic and help to work out those problems that promise so much for the betterment and happiness of mankind.

For many years in our history we claimed to be the country that extended a welcome to the oppressed from every clime. Why have we changed? Are we so content with our own insulation and with the blessings of our institutions that we would exclude the rest of the people of the world from sharing in their advantages? Our marvelous prosperity, unexampled in the history of governments, a growth in a century and a quarter from 3,000,000 to 90,000,000 people, was made possible only by the policy of free immigration that this country has so generously and so wisely observed in the past. The foreign born have contributed their share of energy, devotion, and patriotism to the greatness of the Republic.

I can find nothing in the suggestions of Senators who have spoken on the other side of this proposition to incline me to yield to their view. I shall vote against every educational test. Impose any character test, and it will have my support.

[From a speech of Senator WILLIAM J. STONE, of Missouri, Apr. 19, 1912.]

Of course, education, enlightenment, is most desirable. Universal education is a part of our national policy. All the States are striving, at great public expense, to educate their children. Ignorance is to be regretted. But, Mr. President, I want to say that I do not believe that the people who are ignorant of book lore—the unlettered people—who come to us from Europe are the agitators who stir up and disturb the social and industrial life of America. Education, even rudimental education, is greatly to be desired. Education better fits a man or woman to fight the battle of life in this remarkably intelligent age in which we are living. But, Mr. President, there are in all countries, America among them, thousands of people—law-abiding, honest, industrious, patriotic people—who can neither read nor write, but who are anxious that their children should enjoy better advantages than have come to them. Such people—good, moral, honest, industrious people—come here from Europe, bringing their little ones with them, seeking to enjoy all the wider and better advantages of this great free Republic of ours. These are not bad people; they are good people. We know, if we know anything, that the evangels of the red flag and the disturbers of public order are composed of a class of men who are smart, who are educated, who speak with glib tongues, and who have the power of arousing the passions of their listeners. A man of this type I would exclude, even though he held a college degree; but I would not exclude an honest, law-abiding man merely because he could neither read nor write. This proposed policy is a reversal of our entire national policy up to this time.

* * * * * * *

Mr. President, before closing these observations I wish to say that this literacy test in this bill smacks too much of Know-Nothingism and A. P. A.ism to command my support. All of you are familiar with the old Know-Nothing propaganda, and you are also familiar with the more recent revival of that propaganda under the name of the American Protective Association. Both of these movements were intended to lay drastic and most intolerant proscription upon foreign-born people and upon the membership of the Catholic Church. The era of Know-Nothingism was before my day, but I know as a matter of history that the Democratic Party fought the movement tooth and nail and destroyed it. When A. P. A.ism was projected and raised a threatening hand against the equality of American citizenship because of the accident of birth and because of religious conviction I happened at that time to have the honor of being the governor of Missouri. Without a moment of hesitation I put myself in opposition to the movement. At the meeting of the Democratic State convention in 1894 I wrote a resolution denouncing A. P. A.ism and was successful in having it incorporated in the party platform then adopted. The Democratic Party as an organization followed a similar course throughout the country, and A. P. A.ism, like Know-Nothingism, disappeared as an active force in public affairs. Still there can be no doubt that the intolerant spirit of these movements remains. It lurks quiescent, but it is still in the minds and hearts of many men. I will not say, for I would be most unwilling to believe, that any Senator supporting this educational test approves the intolerant spirit and un-American doctrines of Know-Nothingism or A. P. A.ism; nevertheless, this educational test is but one form of giving new life and vigor to that spirit and those doctrines. I can not support a proposition so strongly marked with intolerance as this one. Why should we deny admission to an honest, manly man of good health and strength and against whose character no word can be spoken simply because, unfortunately, his environments and opportunities have been such as to deny him the advantages of an education? Why, sir, if it had been the rule in many of our States that no man should exercise the right of suffrage who could not read and write, that rule would have disfranchised thousands of honest and patriotic men who believed in orderly government and who stood ever ready to defend American institutions. It has been said with apparent good authority that the parents of more than one man who became President of the United States were illiterate. This we know, that the descendants of men who could neither read nor write have made great names for themselves and added luster to our history. Mr. President, keep out immoral and wicked people; keep out those likely to become a public charge; keep out those who would foment disorder and make war upon our institutions and civilization; but I invoke you not to turn back honest men or virtuous women—men and women who want to work, improve their conditions in life, educate their children, build happy homes, and make themselves good citizens, capable of doing good service to the country—simply and only because they are uneducated.

[Remarks or Senator JAMES E. MARTINE, of New Jersey, in the United States Senate Apr. 18, 1912.]

Mr. President, I can not vote for the literacy test in this bill as a passport to this country. Forty to fifty years ago 90 per cent of the immigrants that came to this country came from Ireland and Germany, and scarcely one of them could have stood this test; and yet all those immigrants, or practically all of them, became industrious citizens, amassed money, yes, fortunes, through their thrift and ambition, and their children to-day are among the best citizens of this country. Education to a man or woman of evil character and disposition will make him or her most dangerous.

Mr. President, this test would have kept my mother, from whose bosom I drank the milk of justice and liberty, from this fair, fair land. I believe that this great country, blessed of God, can digest and assimilate all of the nations of the earth. I have no fear. Let our test be clean morals, sound and clean bodies, and, with a public-school system, we can safely trust the rest to God. As Heaven is my witness, I will never vote to pass a measure that makes this ungenerous and unjust exaction on the part of a free people.

CONGESTION IN LARGE CITIES.

With regard to congestion in large cities, which is also put forth as an argument for further restriction, the following, taken from the abstracts of the report of the Immigration Commission, shows how much this has been exaggerated:

[Extract from Reports of the Immigration Commission, Vol. I, pp. 36–37.]

Of late years the general impression that owing to immigration the poorer districts of the large cities are greatly overcrowded and that in consequence the living conditions are insanitary and even degrading has been so prevalent that it seemed desirable to make a very thorough investigation of this question. In consequence, in seven cities—New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, Boston, Cleveland, Buffalo, Milwaukee—a very careful study was made of the conditions prevailing in the poorer quarters of the city inhabited by immigrants of various races. As was to be expected, many extremely pitiful cases of poverty and overcrowding were found, at times six or seven or even more people sleeping in one small room, sometimes without light or direct access by window or door to the open air. On the whole, however, the average conditions were found materially better than had been anticipated. Moreover, a comparison of the conditions in a great city like New York or Chicago with those in some of the smaller industrial centers, such as mining or manufacturing towns, shows that average conditions as respects overcrowding are very materially worse in some of the small industrial towns than in the large cities. For example, the per cent of households having six or more persons per sleeping room of the race which showed the worst conditions in these large cities was only 5.2, whereas in the industrial centers studied in several cases the proportion was higher than this, and in the case of one race as high as 9.5 per cent.

Moreover, in the large cities the population changes much more frequently than is generally thought. New immigrants are attracted to these poorer residential quarters by the presence of friends or relatives and the necessity of securing living quarters at the lowest possible cost, but as their economic status improves after living in this country for some time, they very generally move to better surroundings. The undesirable districts of the cities that are now inhabited largely by recent immigrants were formerly populated by persons of the earlier immigrant races. Few of these are now found there, and these remnants ordinarily represent the economic failures—the derelicts—among a generation of immigrants which, for the most part, has moved to better surroundings.

In many instances, too, where deplorable conditions were found they were due in part, at any rate, to circumstances over which the inhabitants have little direct control, such as a poor water supply or insanitary drainage—matters that should be attended to by the city authorities.

While instances of extreme uncleanliness were found, the care of the households as regards cleanliness and an attempt to live under proper conditions was usually found unexpectedly good, about five-sixths of all the families visited in the poorer quarters of these large cities keeping their homes in reasonably good or fair condition.

There seems to be little doubt that the various races, owing presumably to their differing environments in Europe, differ somewhat as regards overcrowding and the care of their apartments, but the differences are less than might have been anticipated. The reports seem to indicate clearly that the chief cause of the overcrowding is a desire of the families to keep well within their income or to save money, even at the expense of serious discomfort for the present, in order that they may better their condition in the future. The worst conditions were found among those who live in boarding groups, largely unmarried men, whose purpose in the main is to save money in order that they may send it back to their home country or return thither themselves as soon as a sufficient amount has been secured.

RECENT COMMENTS ON PROPOSED IMMIGRATION LEGISLATION WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO THE PENDING DILLINGHAM BILL, S. 3175.

ADMINISTERING THE IMMIGRATION ACTS.

The ideal immigration law, like the ideal law on any subject within the competence of Congress, should embody certain elementary principles. It should state its purpose plainly instead of by implication. It should go at its purpose directly and not circuitously. It should be so worded as to give the least possible opportunity for the arbitrary exercise of administrative discretion compatible with the execution of the people's will as expressed through their Representatives in Congress. If, at any time, the majority of our people comes to be in favor of restricting immigration, such a policy should be frankly stated and honestly carried out. To legislate by means of administrative regulation is a common enough practice in every country. But it is a method that is peculiarly objectionable when applied to so human a problem as the right of free entry into this country. We can not deal with men and women as Germany's tariff authorities deal with American cattle. When tariff relations between the two countries are pleasant, Germany's "sanitary" precautions against American meat products function kindly. When tariff difficulties arise, Germany need not resort to formal reprisals; the sanitary inspection of American food imports merely becomes very rigid. This is a form of lawmaking by bureaucracy which we ought never to think of in connection with our immigration problem.

Such general considerations must enter into any just opinion of the bill for regulating immigration introduced by Senator DILLINGHAM last summer, and reported with amendments by the Senate Committee on Immigration last week. Several of the provisions in this measure are objectionable, because they contravene the requirements of an honest, above-board immigration policy. The bill contains clauses that are apparently intended as entering wedges for restriction. Ingress into this country is to be surrounded with increased administrative formalities. The right of reentry for aliens is put into question. By defining "aliens" for all administrative purposes of the law as all persons not native born or naturalized citizens of the United States, questions are raised with regard to the wives and minor children of citizens. The provision for the exclusion of "persons not eligible to become citizens by naturalization" is intended as a restatement of the Chinese exclusion acts, but contains the germs of possible misunderstanding with regard to Japanese, Koreans, Malays, and other Asiatics. More than that, it raises the danger of assimilating the execution of our general immigration laws to the methods pursued under the Chinese exclusion acts. Administrative regulations that have hitherto come into play against the Chinese may tend to become general. Restriction will be apt to become exclusion. That may be the intention of the framers of the bill. If so, it should be honestly stated.

Objections of a like nature rise against that clause of the bill which provides that all immigrants shall secure certificates of admission and identity, as well as return certificates upon leaving this country. This not only builds up very serious difficulties about the process of entry and egress, in this country, but tends to create a registry or passport system which is alien to the spirit of our institutions, and, being applied only to one element in the population, takes on the character of class discrimination. In 1882, President Arthur, in a well-known veto message, declared:

"Without expressing an opinion on that point, I may invite the attention of Congress to the fact that the system of personal registration and passports is undemocratic and hostile to the spirit of our institutions. I doubt the wisdom of putting an entering wedge of this kind into our laws. A nation like the United States, jealous of the liberties of its citizens, may well hesitate before it incorporates into its policy a system which is fast disappearing in Europe before the progress of liberal institutions. A wide experience has shown how futile such precautions are, and how easily passports may be borrowed, exchanged, or even forged by persons interested to do so."

We need only think of the merry game of evasion that attends upon the execution of the Chinese exclusion laws to forsee the opportunities for fraud and the miscarriage of justice under a similar practice applied to our vast European immigration.

To a policy of regulation that is indeed regulation no objections can be made. Restriction upon European immigration so far has been almost entirely based on reasons of public health and public morals. It is stated that the deportations of aliens from this country constitute 1 per cent of the total number of arrivals. Though this means a large number of persons in the aggregate, it is perhaps not too large a percentage of insurance against alien disease and crime. But to make medical inspection and administrative routine part of an unwritten scheme for checking immigration is quite another thing. The intelligence and conscience of the country are not behind such measures. (New York Evening Post, Jan. 24, 1912.)

OUR IMMIGRATION POLICY.

To the EDITOR OF THE EVENING POST.

SIR: Your recent editorial on the Dillingham immigration bill (S. 3175), now pending in the United States Senate, should appeal to all Americans. As the purpose of that bill is to amend and codify our immigration laws it should be carefully scrutinized. In addition to the objections named by you, it would give warrant to the average inspector to exclude more than a majority of the incoming immigrants. Under the law as it now stands at least 40,000 were deported during the last two years. The act of 1907, after enumerating several excluded classes, names beggars, paupers, and persons likely to become a public charge. Now, in addition, it is proposed by this bill to add in section 3 a new class, denominated "vagrants." Under this head, inspectors must deport persons (otherwise admissible), "homeless," "wanderers," "who go from place to place," without occupation, and beggars, as defined by the dictionaries. Will not a large majority of immigrants, for the time being homeless, wanderers, without occupation, come under one of these definitions? Would it not have excluded many of our best citizens of foreign birth if adopted earlier in our history?

We all agree that undesirable aliens should be excluded; but home-seekers, otherwise admissible, should not be excluded even though "homeless and wanderers from place to place, and without actual occupation," even though illiterate, for such are needed to develop the unoccupied acreage of the South and West, and the abandoned farms of the Eastern and Middle States, with the intensive farming to which they were accustomed in the fatherland; and to open our mines and to build our roads, aqueducts, tunnels, and canals.

The term "vagrants" is otherwise unfortunate, as it is used by the police in making arrests of suspects and persons sought under extradition proceedings against whom no charges are brought for offenses against local laws. When requested by chiefs of police in other jurisdictions to make such arrests, the charge of "vagrant" is used, for want of something definite. It is too elastic and can be used by immigration officials to exclude multitudes (otherwise admissible), to suit a policy of extreme restriction, on the part of biased immigration inspectors.

My point of view is that of a citizen, a taxpayer, a member of many patriotic ancestral societies, who loves his country and honors its flag. As such I object to the proposed policy of extreme exclusion; I object to the proposed literacy test as applied to robust young farmers, and I believe that good results will follow the adoption of admitted aliens, as wards of the Nation, until they acquire English and learn the rights and duties of citizenship.

J. AUGUSTUS JOHNSON,
New York Evening Post, January 29, 1912.

INJUSTICE IN IMMIGRATION BILLS.

Strong disapproval of the Dillingham bill reported by the Senate committee, further restricting immigration, was expressed yesterday by Max J. Kohler, of 30 Broad Street, who is a member of the committee on immigration of the National Conference of Charities and Correction, of which President Emeritus Eliot, of Harvard, is chairman. Since the bill was reported by Senator LODGE a similar bill, only more restrictive in that it restores the illiteracy test for immigrants which was dropped by the Senate committee, has been introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. FOCHT, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Kohler took exception to both bills, as well as to the Lodge report on the Senate measure.

"That report," he said yesterday, "was calculated, very likely unintentionally, to keep the public in ignorance of radical changes of a revolutionary character in the proposed law. The vague language of the report and its failure to call attention to the important provisions of the bill are probably responsible for the failure of the press to refer to these radical changes which would not otherwise have escaped strong comment.

"One very important provision of this sort is veiled in the report by language referring simply to a proposed consolidation of the Chinese immigration service with the general immigration service in the interest of economy.' As a matter of fact, section 3 of the bill, to which the report here alludes, excludes all persons not eligible to become citizens by naturalization, with specified exceptions, and provides for certificates of admission and identity for all admitted aliens against which certificates of readmission upon the departure of such aliens from the United States are to be issued.

"WOULD VIOLATE TREATIES.

"This provision is in substance a reenactment of the Chinese-exclusion laws, except that it extends them to other Asiatics such as Japanese, Koreans, Malays, and the like. The statute would violate our treaties with China, with Japan (with whom we have now a 'gentleman's agreement' excluding only laborers), and with other countries, and would cause much friction. While it might ameliorate the Chinese-exclusion laws somewhat, in some respects, and make them more oppressive in others, it would have a very bad effect in consolidating these laws with our general immigration laws, and accustom the immigration authorities—who would then enforce all these provisions in common—with the practice in vogue under the Chinese-exclusion laws, of rejecting uncontradicted evidence in favor of aliens.

"More revolutionary still is the provision in section 18, requiring all alien immigrants whatsoever to procure in duplicate 'certificates of admission and identification,' and return certificates, thus establishing a sort of 'ticket of leave' system for all aliens. What the use of the certificate would be is not apparent, as, unlike the Chinese-exclusion laws, it is not made the exclusive method of establishing right of residence here—in which event it would be very oppressive, because of loss of certificates, changes in appearance, and impossibility of segregating aliens from American citizens and aliens who are now here, who are not required to have any certificates—and is not authority for readmission of such aliens after trips abroad. Its enforcement would cost millions of dollars in the way of additional Government employees to make out such certificates, and it would seriously retard ingress of all aliens into the country while the certificates are being prepared and retard their egress on visits abroad while arranging to secure return certificates, and ignorance of these silly requirements would lead to many thousands of exclusions and deportations. A general discriminatory antialien feeling would be engendered by these provisions and even in the present form they probably are violative of treaty obligations toward foreign countries.

"We do not want to have paupers come here, nor persons likely to become paupers; nor anarchists, criminals, contract laborers, or persons mentally or physically defective. On the other hand, we do not want our laws to be so phrased as to keep out others who are desirable and whom this country needs." (New York Times, Jan. 27, 1912.)

[Rev. Percy S. Grant, minister of the Church of the Ascension, New York City, in the North American Review, April, 1912.]

The rapidity with which the democratic ideas are taken on by immigrants under the influence of our institutions is remarkable. I have personally had experiences with French-Canadians, Portuguese, Hebrews, and Italians. These races have certainly taken advantage of their opportunities among us in a fashion to promise well for their final effect upon this country. The French-Canadian has become a sufficiently good American to have given up his earlier program of turning New England into a new France—that is, into a Catholic province—or of returning to the Province of Quebec. He is seeing something better than a racial or religious ideal in the freedom of American citizenship, and on one or two occasions, when he had political power in two municipalities, he refrained from exercising it to the detriment of the public-school system. He has added a gracious manner and a new feeling for beauty to New England traits.

The Portuguese have taken up neglected or abandoned New England agricultural land and have turned it to productive and valuable use. Both the French-Canadian and the Portuguese have come to us by way of the New England textile mills.

The actual physical machinery of civilization—cotton mills, woolen mills, iron mills, etc.—lock up a great deal of human energy, physical and mental, just as 100 years ago the farms did, from which later sprang most of the members of our dominant industrial class. A better organization of society, by which machinery would do still more and afford a freer play for mental and physical energy and organization, would find a response from classes that are now looked upon as not contributing to our American culture; would unlock the high potentialities in the laboring classes now unguessed and unexpended.

The intellectual problems and the advanced thinking of the Hebrew, his fondness for study, and his freedom on the whole from wasteful forms of dissipation, sport, and mental stagnation, constitute him a more fortunate acquisition for this country than are thousands of the descendants of colonial settlers. In short, we must reconstruct our idea of democracy—of American democracy. This done, we must construct a new picture of citizenship. If we do these things we shall welcome the rugged strength of the peasant or the subtle thought of the man of the Ghetto in our reconsidered American ideals. After all, what are these American ideals we boast so much about? Shall we say public schools, the ballot, freedom? The American stock use private schools when they can afford them; they too often leave town on election day; as for freedom, competent observers believe it is disappearing. The conservators and believers in American ideals seem to be our immigrants. To the Russian Jew Abraham Lincoln is a god. If American ideals are such as pay honor to the intellectual and to the spiritual or foster human brotherhood, or love culture and promote liberty, then they are safe with our new citizens, who are eager of these things.

IMMIGRATION A VITAL QUESTION.

Justin F. Denechaud, secretary of the Louisiana State board of immigration, who is here attending the Southern Commercial Congress, said to-day:

"To the South more than to any other section of the country immigration is a vital question. Those in charge of recommending to Congress changes in our immigration laws should bear in mind that our section is yet practically undeveloped. In my State alone, Louisiana, with an area of more than 29,000,000 acres, only 5,000,000 acres, or about one-sixth, is now developed.

"Not only do we need a large population to till the soil, but we also need laborers to build railroads and ditches. Where is this labor to come from unless it is from the countries of Europe? The European immigrant was admitted and furnished for the North, East, and West in their development. I do not wish to be misunderstood and to mean that the Government should let down the bars and admit the undesirables, but I do mean that the bars should not be put so high as only the educated and the man with means shall be permitted to enter this country. The passage of such a law as is being asked of Congress from many quarters will deprive the South of its needed labor. The rapid development of the agricultural lands in the South will be the means of checking immigration of the American farmer into frozen Canada." (Nashville (Tenn.) Banner, Apr. 8, 1912.)

The Western and Southern States need more white people. They are all thinly populated, and they will surely be heard from when the proposed literacy test comes to a final vote.

Underlying the Dillingham-Lodge bill is the fetish of Teutonic superiority and Latin degeneracy, and even of the ancient jealousy of all race mixtures as a danger to the American stock and to American ideals. These notions were long ago disproven. This country still needs and long will need all the honest, able-bodied men it can secure, no matter what European country furnishes them. (Birmingham (Ala.) Age-Herald, Apr. 25, 1912.)

PROPOSED IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION.

The effort to restrict immigration comes partly from a labor element that fears competition and partly from a social element that has little or no knowledge of the history and the results of immigration in this country. The effort to restrict by an educational clause in the immigration law is a makeshift, an evasion of an issue that the politician does not wish to meet openly. It will not exclude the criminal, the diseased, or the otherwise undesirable. It will exclude many whose muscles are needed and whose exclusion would retard our economic development. If Congress believes that the labor market is, or is immediately likely to be, unduly overcrowded and our interests thereby endangered, it is within the power of that body to prohibit immigration or to limit the number of arrivals for a period of years. But the real trouble is not in the number of those who come. Broadly, the labor market is not overcrowded. Wages have risen in the term of the heaviest immigration in the history of the country. The difficulties of the question are behind the gates and not at them. (New York Sun, May 6, 1912.)

THE LITERACY TEST.

The proposed literacy test would keep out a great many immigrants, but it is doubtful if it would exclude the really undesirable aliens, the proletariat that produces social ferment in dense alien populations.

Criminals are not the illiterates as a rule. Some education is required to write Black Hand letters and some degree of intelligence is needed to make bombs. (Jersey City (N. J.) Journal, May 11, 1912.)

THE LITERACY TEST.

The literacy test can not be made too general or all immigrants would be barred. A mere smattering knowledge would be of little benefit to an immigrant. Among the very poor it is usually the man of little education who is the malcontent, and it most frequently happens that the criminal classes are recruited from that class.

The able-bodied illiterate is of more value to this country than the physically weak with a scant education.

The literacy test is a poor one. So widespread is the protest against the bills that enactment seems very improbable. (Fargo (N. Dak.) Forum, May 16, 1912.)

THE IMMIGRATION QUESTION.

Would any real advantage come to the country from the enactment of the Dillingham immigration bills? One familiar argument for it is that the United States is receiving immigrants now who are not readily assimilable. But it is not illiteracy that makes the immigrant from parts of southern and eastern Europe unassimilable. If he can not be assimilated it is because his racial unlikeness to the settlers of this continent is too great. But the literacy test will keep out only a fraction of the alien races. The problem of their assimilation will remain unsolved.

Nor will the literacy test be sure to keep out the least desirable of the arriving immigrants. It is not usually the man who can not read and write who recruits an anarchist population here. It is the "intellectual proletariat" of Europe which, coming here, congregates in cities and adds to their ferment. The man who works with his hands has always found his place readily in this country, and if he ever makes trouble, by strikes and rioting, it is only as he begins to be assimilated and to develop the American standard of living. Again, the criminals who come to this country and are one of the gravest evils of immigration are seldom of the illiterate class. Illiterates do not write Black Hand letters. It is worthy of note also that some of the illiterates who come here do not require to be assimilated. They form a sort of international balance of labor, moving back and forth between this country and Europe as their services are required, and always intending to live finally in their old home. (New York Tribune, May 9, 1912.)

LITERACY TEST FOR VOTING, NOT FOR WORKING.

In the vigorous protest against the Dillingham bill "to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States," which slipped so easily through the Senate and is now before the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, a special point is made against the clause which would include among those to be denied admission to the country, "all aliens over 16 years of age and physically capable of reading and writing who can not read and write the English language or some other language." * * * The objection to the admission of illiterate aliens seems to come mainly from two sources—from organizations of workingmen already here, mostly of alien origin, who wish to restrict competition in labor, and from those who regard as politically or socially dangerous large masses of "ignorant foreigners," who gather in industrial centers, like the factory towns and mining districts, and who are easily led into lawless demonstrations in time of excitement.

Many immigrants are unfortunately illiterate, without fault of their own, and without lacking intelligence and character which will make them useful and peaceable subjects of a free government. Most of them are industrious and thrifty, and a large proportion are desirous of learning and of having their children educated. They are capable of becoming a desirable element in the working population, and most of them do become so. (New York Journal of Commerce, May 19, 1912.)

In general it may be said that the literacy test is the poorest possible means of determining the value of a prospective immigrant. * * *

Immigration has been one of the most essential factors in the development and prosperity of the United States. A great part of the country is still but sparsely settled and no part is so overcrowded that there is not room for many more. Intelligent distribution of immigration would be a much wiser policy than restriction by a literacy test. (Buffalo (N. Y.) Express, May 9, 1912.)

THE MASS MEETING TO-DAY.

The mass meeting this afternoon at the Star Theater is called to voice the protest of Buffalo against unwise and unjust restriction in immigration laws of the United States.

That this protest will be logical in significance, spirited in expression, and impressive in the numbers supporting it, is certain. * * *

The Times believes the sterling citizenship of Buffalo, irrespective of nationality, is with that large portion of our population which has taken the lead in this matter.

We have equal faith that the citizenhood of the Nation is with it, too.

Every American, except the few aboriginal inhabitants of this country, is an immigrant or the descendant of an immigrant.

Without immigrants, there could have been no civilized nation on this continent.

If all the restrictions on immigration, which are now exercised, or which are pending, had been put in force against the Puritan Fathers of New England, the Catholics who settled Maryland, the cavaliers who built the first settlement in Virginia, the Quakers who established Philadelphia, and the poor debtors who founded Georgia, the beginnings of this Republic would have been nipped in the bud.

It is proposed to exclude worthy immigrants because they can't read and write.

Daniel Boone couldn't read and write.

The literacy test is no test at all.

Many of the best-known men of Buffalo, men prominent in manifold walks of life, men distinguished as clergymen, officials, lawyers, publicists, and orators, constitute the corps of speakers at to-day's mass meeting.

There is no need to anticipate the arguments of such men.

The duty of the occasion is to do all that is in us to maintain the hospitality of the United States, that quality which has made this country the refuge of the oppressed throughout the world, and which has been repaid to America many times over by the loyalty, the blood, the toil, the money, and the patriotism of her foreign-born citizens. (Buffalo (N. Y.) Times, May 12, 1912.)

OUR FOREIGN ELEMENT.

That there should be very vigorous opposition to the so-called Dillingham immigration bill, now under discussion in the United States Senate, is not to be wondered at.

Had the restrictions it seeks to impose been in force during the last 60 or 70 years the country would have been deprived of thousands upon thousands of immigrants who came here and made good, and whose descendants are to-day among the very flower of American citizenship.

A test of illiteracy is not a fair test. Cardinal Gibbons puts the case strongly and truthfully when he says that illiteracy is not ignorance or incompetence—that if the immigrant is industrious and thrifty he will make a useful citizen, whether he be literate or illiterate.

The thousands who have been coming to Lowell and kindred communities during the last 15 or 20 years, and against whose kind the Dillingham bill is aimed, have shown themselves to be both industrious and thrifty.

And they have recently given striking demonstrations that they are no more minded to work for too low wages than are other nationalities whose immigration began earlier—that they want to lift themselves up to the American standard of living, not pull that standard down.

They are seeking to adapt themselves to American ways and are making more rapid progress than is generally appreciated. The "natives" will profit by getting in touch with them and lending a helping hand.

They are, too, as a rule, temperate as well as industrious and thrifty. Few of them are seen in the police court, and fewer still in the almshouse. (Lowell (Mass.) Telegram, May 12, 1912.)

THE BROAD VIEW.

Every effort to restrict immigration on the ground of illiteracy alone has proved a failure from the beginning of the agitation for it, many years ago. The great majority of the people have been opposed to it since their attention was called to it by the able veto message of President Cleveland when such a bill reached him for consideration. The bill had gone through Congress with little debate, but he put a stop to the movement for restraint of the kind provided in the bill, and it has made no progress since then, even with the large immigration from southern Europe that alarms a number of excellent citizens. (Buffalo (N. Y.) Express, May 13, 1912.)

ILLIBERAL AND HARSH REQUIREMENTS.

This Senate bill makes ability to read and write in some language or dialect one of the requirements for the admission of those over 16 years of age. The immigrants from a certain number of countries are excluded from this requirement, but it applies generally to all immigrants from Europe, except certain relatives of immigrants who are themselves admissible. It is as moderate an application of the illiteracy disqualification as can well be made, yet it is felt by many good people to be harsh and unfair, and vigorous protests are being made against it.

If to be totally illiterate means always to be idle or stupid, it would be an entirely proper test for exclusion. But some immigrants fleeing from hard conditions and an oppressive government in the Old World have never had an opportunity to learn to read or write. Their labor would be acceptable here and their inability to read would not necessarily prevent their being orderly and self-supporting citizens. A man who has been denied opportunities to learn to read may be intelligent in spite of his illiteracy. A man of brains and brawn, in good health, and of unimpeachable character, should not be barred out of this land because conditions beyond his control have prevented him from learning to read. (Philadelphia (Pa.) Press, May 14, 1912.)

THE DILLINGHAM BILL.

The Dillingham bill now pending in Congress marks a wide departure from the generally accepted theory followed for many years concerning immigration. To restrict and to restrain are the cardinal principles of the proposed act. Heretofore the main idea of legislation has been to regulate, and not to prevent. There are those who believe that the time has come when such a change as that now proposed is necessary; that an absolute barrier must be raised against the hordes of those aliens who certainly are not elevating the standard of citizenship. On the other hand, the question is asked whether it is wise or humane to refuse a refuge and a haven to those who simply have been so unfortunate as to be born or reared in countries possessing less natural advantages or less endowed with the blessings of liberty. * * *

A man who can not read or write is not necessarily unworthy. Illiteracy is a misfortune, not a crime, and the illiterate should not have the door of opportunity shut in his face because he was unable to enjoy in his own land the advantages of education. Such a law penalizes misfortune and is un-American. (Buffalo (N. Y.) Commercial, May 15, 1912.)

ILLITERACY NOT IGNORANCE.

Last Sunday afternoon a meeting was held in this city to protest against the passage of the Dillingham and Burnett bills, now pending in Congress.

The principal bone of contention is the senseless educational test.

The speakers were Adelbert Moot; Col. John B. Weber, former Representative and Commissioner of Immigration, who has made a study of the immigration problem; Representative CHARLES B. SMITH; Health Commissioner Fronczak; and Dr. Borzilleri.

The suggested educational test is uncalled for, unnecessary, silly. Thousands of immigrants who were unable to read, unable to write, have come to this country. They have made good. Their citizenship is of the first class. They have been builders. The Nation could not well have done without them. (Buffalo (N. Y.) Times, May 16, 1912.)

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION.

Of course paupers and criminals should be excluded. They should stay where they are produced. They will not develop our country. But those who will develop our resources and strength ought to be welcomed. That is a plain principle, but at present it is openly or covertly opposed on grounds that will not stand examination. In its extreme of narrow absurdity it appears in the policy urged and adopted in Australia, where in the assumed interest of labor it would discourage even white immigration. The one and only argument back of all these exclusion rules is, confessed or unconfessed, that a paucity of labor is desired by a class of laborers, so that they may secure larger wages by the resulting competition for it. There then follows for them an increased cost of living by the increased price of products, and the process goes on, more cost of living, more wages.

The Dillingham bill, now being considered in Congress, is another law intended to unify our laws for restricting population by immigration. The purpose we do not approve. We regard it as unwise in political economy, and ungenerous and indefensible morally. It is of the same ethical type as the action of the titled passengers on the lifeboat only half filled, who were unwilling to try to save others that were struggling in the sea. Immigrants come here to improve their condition a great deal; they are told they must not do it for fear we shall be crowded a little.

Senator DILLINGHAM'S able defense of the bill brings out some important admissions resulting from the very careful investigation of the conditions of immigration. It appears that immigrants as a body are choice people, the choice of their race, whatever that race may be. They have more than usual enterprise. They are of those who have ambition to improve their condition. They are strong and healthy young people. They are able and willing to work. It appears further that an illiteracy test does not shut out criminals; criminals generally can read. Immigrants are, on the whole, picked people. The children of immigrants attend our public schools more faithfully than do the children of native parents. Further, there is no effort on the part of foreign governments to dump their undesirable citizens on our shores. No evidence of that could be found. * * *

The main provision is that those who can not read are excluded. The argument given for this exclusion is not that the illiterate are not useful laborers, nor that they are more criminal, but that they take the unskilled fields of labor, and that these fields are overcrowded. Evidence of this is that the annual income of such laborers in the coal and steel industries, as compared with their daily wage, shows that there are considerable periods of nonemployment. It is not made clear that such cessation from work is due to the failure of work to do. We judge that those who are willing to work steadily can get work, and it would not be bad if those who are less faithful should be crowded into other less toilsome and less remunerative pursuits. The purpose of the bill is to exclude common laborers, such as work in mines or on railroads. It is further the aim to shut out those who do not desire to make their permanent home here, for nearly half of those who come go back to live. If this is the case, one would think it would please these enemies of immigration. The young men come here, enrich the country more by their work than we are impoverished by the money we pay them, and which they send or carry back to Italy or Hungary, and they do not remain to be further competitors in the labor market; and yet the bill tries to exclude these temporary creators of wealth. The policy and purpose are indefensible. (The Independent, New York, May 16, 1912.)

LITERACY TEST FOR VOTING.

The Senate passed the Dillingham bill to limit immigration by means of a literacy test, but the House hesitates, and public sentiment is rapidly changing in relation to the bill. * * *

The Dillingham bill proposes to exclude "all aliens over 16 years of age and physically capable of reading and writing, who can not read and write the English language or some other language." This would shut out many immigrants who would soon become useful citizens. If the country had a better plan of distribution—if immigrants were landed at other ports than New York, no objection to their coming here would arise. Better distribution and a delay in naturalization would be better remedies. In other words the literacy test should arise when admission to citizenship is applied for and not to admission to residence in the country. If we apply it to the latter we turn our backs on our traditions and on thousands whose only crime is the plotting for freedom against tyranny at home. We are not ready to stand for despotism and against liberty even to please some Senators. (Birmingham (Ala.) Age-Herald, May 17, 1912.)

THE LITERACY TEST.

The literacy test is undoubtedly the weak feature of the Dillingham immigration bill. In the opinion of Charles Nagel, Secretary of Commerce and Labor, illiteracy does not stand in the way of assimilation, and we should imagine that this was the correct view to take of the matter. The illiterate man comes to our shores with his mind in a receptive condition. He is willing and even anxious to learn our methods of doing things. He has remained illiterate because his opportunities for education have been few. Here he will find many such opportunities, and if he is the right sort he will be quick to take advantage of them. It isn't the illiterate man, as a rule, that we have to fear, but the man who comes here laboring under the delusion that he knows it all, so to speak, and is unwilling to be taught. These are the sort of men who are apt to turn dangerous agitators and sometimes do. If a man has a strong, healthy body and a well-balanced mind he should be a most desirable immigrant, no matter whether he is illiterate or not. If illiterate he will work and acquire an education in spite of the poor start he has had at home. Capacity for work and willingness to perform it more than counterbalance a failure to stand a literacy test. Such a test is therefore palpably undesirable. (Brockton (Mass.) Times, May 27, 1912.)

NO IMMIGRATION LEGISLATION.

Better no legislation at all on the immigration question than bad legislation. The voice of the Nation has declared too emphatically against such propositions as that of the Root amendment for the deportation to their countries of political refugees and the proposition to shut out some of our most useful elements of citizenship by imposing a literacy test. (Newark (N. J.) Star, May 30, 1912.)

SIFTING THE IMMIGRANTS.

What qualities do we want in our immigrants to make them a welcome addition to our population? Without undertaking to give a comprehensive answer to this question, there are certainly four qualities which are needed:

Good physical health.

The economic virtues, such as temperance, honesty, and thrift.

A desire to become Americans, and the purpose to remain in America.

Capacity to become assimilated with the American population.

And the classes which we desire to exclude from America are also four:

Physical, mental, and moral degenerates.

Idlers, agitators, and cranks. We can breed all of these we want without help from the Old World.

Transients who come here to earn a little money, to live as near the edge of poverty as possible to be while in this country—Hungarians, Italians, Poles, and the like—and to return to their homes as soon as they have accumulated a meager competence.

Those whose race peculiarities are such as make intermarriage with the American people and assimilation into the American Nation undesirable if not impossible.

What the Nation wants of Congress is such legislation as will sift our immigration on the lines indcated above.

No simple provision, such as a perfunctory test of reading and writing, or a certain amount of money in hand, or the demand of a larger head tax, will suffice to solve our immigrant problem. We must either be willing to organize an effective and competent method of selecting the immigrants we want or we must continue to take them as they come and do the best we can with them when they are here. (The Outlook, New York, June 1, 1912.)

ILLITERACY AND IMMIGRATION.

One honest, hard-working illiterate, who lives clean and raises a decent family, is worth a hundred of the inefficients our schools turn out annually, who can read and write, but who are too fine to work and who are utterly useless in the civilization they live in. We place too high an estimate upon mere literacy; but if we paid more attention to teaching children that morality which comprehends respect for parents and law and the necessity of earning bread by the sweat of their face, we would not be troubled so much with the envy and discontent which are the outgrowth of laziness and inefficiency.

The literacy test for the exclusion of immigrants is the sheerest humbug; had such a law been in force since the early seventeenth century, America would still be a howling wilderness. The American troubles of the twentieth century are not the fruits of illiteracy and immigration; they are made right here on the soil by those born on the soil, by the lazy, the inefficient, the envious, the unsuccessful—all the products of our public schools. Go to your prisons some time and learn how many of the inmates are illiterates. When literacy has become a synonym for sanity, honesty, industry, and physical soundness it will be time enough to make illiteracy a barrier for admission to the Republic. I would rather have an illiterate who can steer a plow, wield a sledge, roof a house, lay brick, or dig a good sewer than a dozen half baked chaps who can write dog and read cat and who are willing to live on the labor of a father and mother. Let Congress face the question fairly, and let the Government back up the immigration authorities in enforcing the laws we have. The illiterate test is pure punk, just plain flapdoodle. (Boston (Mass.) Morning Herald, June 3, 1912.)

LABOR SCARCITY AND IMMIGRATION.

All of these facts may serve to remind us how fortunate the country has been to escape the limitation of immigration, which was so warmly urged in the last session of Congress and still threatens. There could be no greater folly from the industrial point of view than to require, as does this bill, that everyone shall be excluded who can not pass a literacy test and show some knowledge of English. For certain lines of work no American-born laborers are available—particularly is this true of unskilled labor in the iron and steel trades. In them such a restriction would speedily become crippling. It is no answer to this that conditions of work should be so attractive as to bring it to a higher class of men. Much can be done, indubitably, in this direction. But American labor will enter certain lines of work on no terms. Foreign labor will; why should it be compelled to master a new tongue before entering? For decades past the heavy outdoor work has been done by Irish or negroes or Italians or Slavs; the history of many a long-established industry is the story of first one nationality and then another carrying it onward. The United States needs immigration more than any other country, because here men rise rapidly in the social scale, as they can not elsewhere. The sons and daughters of one generation of day tollers are clerks or artisans. And to put up the bars at this particular period in our history would be to deal a blow in advance to our coming prosperity. (New York Evening Post, Sept. 23, 1912.)

THE ILLITERACY TEST.

The spirit of the Statue of Liberty in the harbor of New York, which, to immigrants catching their first sight of America, symbolizes the land of freedom, equality, and democracy, was well represented by the New York delegation in Congress yesterday, when the entire group of Democrats from that State went on record in caucus against the immigration bill, with its unfair illiteracy test for incoming foreigners.

If the United States made any pretensions to being a country dedicated exclusively to the "upper classes," the erudite, and the fastidious, the immigration bill which has been included in the Democratic program for the present session would be an accurate reflection of such sentiments. If, however, the United States is to remain what it was intended to be—a haven for the oppressed, the lover of liberty and freedom, the toiler, and the ambitious—then the present bill is a step backward toward an exclusiveness which, if exercised 100 years ago, would have paralyzed the growth of the Nation.

The illiteracy test would have robbed the country of some of its strongest and greatest men. Some of the ablest lawyers at the bar, the noblest humanitarians, the best and most progressive business men of to-day are the progeny of parents who could neither read nor write when they came to the United States.

Is opportunity to be denied to all those who have not had the advantage of an education in the countries where they were born? Many of the immigrants who can neither read nor write are the quickest students, once they have landed on American soil. Barring them from entering this country will deprive the Nation of the rich blood that is needed if the country is to continue to grow as it has grown in the past.

Many American-born men and women have been unable to obtain an education until they were well on in life, and yet have grown into fine manhood and womanhood. Criminals are frequently well educated, and so are many incompetents. The country needs as many healthy European immigrants as will come here, and the only tests that should be applied are those of health and morality. (Washington Post, Dec. 5, 1912.)

RESOLUTIONS.

[Memorial and resolutions adopted at a mass meeting held at Cooper Union May 5, 1912.]

From the establishment of our Government it has been its consistent policy not only to permit but to encourage immigration into the United States. In consequence, our resources have been developed, new and important industries have been established, the great West has been peopled, and we have been blessed by a prosperity which is unparalleled in the annals of history. But for this liberal policy there would have been a dearth in the land of that vital energy which is an essential to material and moral improvement. A considerable percentage of those who have largely contributed to the progressiveness of our Nation are either immigrants themselves or the sons and daughters of immigrants.

While the right and the duty of our Government to regulate immigration is conceded, to the end that those who would imperil our prosperity and the permanence of our institutions should be excluded, it would be a genuine misfortune if any laws arbitrarily restrictive of immigration were enacted. It would be retrogression. It would close our gates to the oppressed who have hitherto been afforded refuge, and to those who supply strong arms and stout hearts to our industrial activities and further the increase of our national wealth.

Senate bill 3175, known as the Dillingham bill, and similar legislation now pending in Congress, if enacted, would operate as a reversal of that policy which has hitherto so signally contributed to our national greatness. Their most significant feature is the literacy test. This proposed restriction is conceded by its authors to be purely arbitrary. It would not exclude those who are inimical to our form of government, for they are usually highly educated. It would not keep out those who are physically, mentally, or morally degenerate. On the contrary, it will affect principally those whose brawn and muscle and whose obedience to law and authority make them especially useful and desirable as additions to our population.

It is this part of our immigrants which has built our railroads, canals, tunnels, and aqueducts; which labors in our mines, on our public highways, and upon our farms, which are being deserted by those of American birth. It is they who laboriously toil in those occupations which are avoided by our older population. Many of them learn to read and write after they arrive here. Their children avail themselves of the educational opportunities which are afforded them, and in a few years are not distinguishable from the descendants of the early settlers. If this test had been applied to the immigration of the last 60 years it would not only have seriously impaired our working capacity, but it would have deprived the country of great moral and ethical forces which have strengthened the public sense of solidarity.

The test proposed is the ability to read and write various clauses of the Constitution of the United States—a test with which many of our native-born citizens would find it difficult to comply. To require a foreigner, unfamiliar with our political phraseology, to undergo successfully such an examination under the most trying conditions, with none to sit in judgment but an inspection officer, would be most unjust. If it were deliberately intended to enmesh and entangle him, it could not be more effectually accomplished. Immigration should not be confounded with naturalization.

The pending bills are further objectionable because they contain a provision in the nature of a ticket of leave, which practically requires an immigrant at his peril to keep in his possession a certificate issued to him on his arrival, and another, added in the tumult of debate, which though with proper protective clauses now absent, might be appropriate in a neutrality law, has no possible relevancy to an immigration act by which an alien charged with a conspiracy for the violent overthrow of a foreign Government may be summarily deported to his death without the right of trial by jury and without judicial hearing of any kind, even though he may himself be the victim of criminal espionage and conspiracy.

Believing for these reasons that the passage of the pending bills would be an unqualified misfortune to the country and give rise to grave injustice and gross abuses,

It is resolved by this assemblage, composed of citizens who have given to this subject mature thought, that it vigorously protests against the proposed legislation, and fervently prays that no immigration laws be enacted which shall not be in complete accord with the principles which we have herein advocated; that copies of this memorial be forwarded to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and to every Senator and Representative in Congress, and that they be urgently requested to oppose the enactment of these proposed restrictive laws as being detrimental to our common welfare and inconsistent with those American ideals which have given the stimulus of humanity to the conscience of the world.

[At a town meeting held in Philadelphia, May 8, 1912, at Musical Fund Hall, under the chairmanship of Dr. C. J. Hexamer, president of the German-American Alliance, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted.]

Whereas the United States Senate has passed the Dillingham bill and the Burnett bill is now before the House of Representatives, both of which contain educational tests for immigrants, be it resolved by the citizens of Philadelphia in meeting assembled that we are unqualifiedly opposed to an educational test for immigrants.

We hold that existing law prohibits the incoming of criminals, paupers, lunatics, persons of immoral life, those afflicted with contagious diseases, and all others who may reasonably be regarded as dangerous to the public welfare or likely to become burdens upon the public purse. These provisions are sufficient for the exclusion of all unfit immigrants, and any further restriction must inevitably result in inhumanity and wrong.

That the literacy requirement is not a fair measure of moral worth, of economic value, of mental capacity, or civic worth.

Experience proves that moral soundness—simply honesty—is independent of intellectual culture. The vast majority of those ignorant of letters are morally sound, while a minority of the literate are morally defective despite their education.

The proposed changes in existing law is a reversal of the fundamental principles of our free Government and the history and traditions of our country. It has been the consistent will and policy of the people of the United States that this land should ever be a refuge for the oppressed and persecuted of the earth. It is inconceivable that a free and prosperous people, whose institutions are founded upon the broadest humanity and the most explicit recognition of the rights of man, could wish to close its ports against peaceable, honest, worthy, and industrious men and women seeking for themselves and their children political, religious, and industrial freedom. To turn them back, because of defective education, to the oppression and misery from which they are escaping would be for this Nation stultification and shame.

We further protest against section 18 of the Senate bill, which is of a far-reaching character, has the result of placing worthy immigrants upon the same plane as persons sent to penal colonies, and will undoubtedly work hardship. It, moreover, virtually establishes an internal passport system which up to this time has only been known in the most autocratic of Governments.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

[Resolutions adopted at a mass meeting at Faneuil Hall, Boston, May 5, 1912.]

Resolved, That this meeting of the citizens of Boston protests against the adoption of the Dillingham and Burnett bills as being un-American in spirit and harmful to the best interests of the future people of the United States.

Resolved further, That the chairman of the committee organizing this meeting shall appoint a committee of five, who shall proceed to Washington to urge upon the individual Members of the House of Representatives and upon the officials of the parties the objections of this meeting to the proposed good-conduct certificates for immigrants.

[Resolution adopted by a mass meeting of the citizens of Cleveland, May 9, 1912.]

Whereas there is now pending in the House of Representatives two measures known as the Dillingham bill (S. 3175) and the Burnett bill (H. R. 22527), both of which provide that a literacy test be applied to all immigrants entering the United States; and

Whereas the Dillingham bill, in addition to a literacy test, provides that all immigrants be required to carry with them a certificate of identity; and

Whereas we not only regard those provisions as hostile to the spirit of our American institutions, but also believe that they would work injustice to worthy immigrants and deprive our country of an element which, on the basis of experience, would develop into worthy citizenship; and

Whereas we believe that such restrictive legislation will seriously retard the commercial and industrial progress of this country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the citizens of Cleveland, in mass meeting assembled, representing every element of our citizenship, protest against the passage of Senate bill No. 3175 and House bill No. 22527, and that we earnestly appeal to our Representatives in Congress to put forth every effort at their command for the purpose of defeating these two measures; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States and to our Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

[Resolutions of Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce, June 3, 1912.]

Our national boast has been that this country was the refuge for the downtrodden and oppressed, who in a healthy bodily and mental condition, and with a law-abiding spirit, sought entrance at our gates with a view of making this country their home and taking their chances with us. This sentiment has built up our national idea of free Americanism. The immigration of the able-bodied and honestly inclined has contributed in a large degree to the greatness and prosperity of this Republic.

In the line of our tradition and of the principle that has guided us in the past, through means of which our country stands preeminent as the land of liberty and freedom and equal opportunity, we can not afford to close our doors to those who still unfortunately suffer from oppression existing in foreign lands merely because they can not read, although otherwise qualified for admission under existing laws.

The proposed educational test, if enacted into law, will affect the immigration of the very people this country needs most, namely, the honest, thrifty, industrious, and self-supporting laboring classes; and in this respect they are harsh and oppressive measures.

When the various phases of this question are considered we can not but reach the conclusion that if any of the proposed bills requiring the educational test for immigrants seeking admission to this country is enacted into law it will not only be against the policies of this country, under which it has grown to greatness, but against the interests of the Nation at large and especially against the best interests of Pennsylvania.

[Resolutions of Italian-American Business Men's Association, Buffalo, N. Y., May 8, 1912.]

Resolved, That we, the Italian-American Business Men's Association of the city of Buffalo, N. Y., representing the sentiment of 60,000 Italians in Buffalo and western New York, earnestly protest against the enactment of any law which denies the right of entry to the United States of those who, through no fault of their own, have failed to receive an education; we denounce the illiteracy test proposed in the Dillingham and Burnett bills as un-American in spirit and opposed to the principles on which this Nation was founded, namely, that it is the haven and refuge of the oppressed of every land; that it is antagonistic to the commercial and industrial advancement of this country.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 28186, the fortifications appropriation bill, and pending that I ask unanimous consent that general debate be now closed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 28186, and pending that he asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be considered closed. Is there objection?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should be glad if the gentleman in charge of the bill would give some little further time for discussion of the bill before he closes general debate.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that any reasonable request under the five-minute rule will no doubt be granted. We have had one day's debate on this bill; we are in the situation that in a very few weeks the session will end, and the majority portion of the great supply bills are unacted upon.

Mr. FOWLER. I have never taken one moment's unnecessary time of the House in discussion.

Mr. SHERLEY. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. FOWLER. Ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will modify my request, Mr. Speaker, to the extent of asking that the general debate close in 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Reserving the right to object, I do not care to press the gentleman if he wants to get on with his bill, but I should like 10 minutes of general debate.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest that there will be an opportunity for the gentleman under the five-minute rule.

Mr. RODDENBERY. It is purely a matter of preference, but I should prefer to have 10 minutes of general debate rather than to take it under the 5-minute rule, because if taken under the 5-minute rule it might provoke discussion.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am sure that it will not provoke discussion because, being in charge of the bill, I shall see to it that the debate is confined to the bill. I am trying to expedite the real public business of the House, business that ought to be attended to.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I do not desire to press the gentleman, but I should like to have 10 minutes under the head of general debate before the gentleman goes into the consideration of the measure under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to modify my request to the extent of asking that general debate close in 25 minutes, the gentleman from Georgia to have 10 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] to have 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky modifies his request, and asks unanimous consent that general debate be closed in 25 minutes, 10 minutes to be given to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] and 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. SHERLEY was then agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the fortifications appropriation bill, with Mr. RUSSELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 28186, the fortifications appropriation bill. By order of the House general debate will be closed in 25 minutes, 10 minutes to be given to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] and 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I heard with interest day before yesterday the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], explanatory of the fortifications bill, and it appeared to me that he fully and comprehensively covered the bill, and his remarks reflecting the action of the committee manifested great care and doubtless much wisdom.

I am not disposed to interrupt the orderly business of the House, but I desire, Mr. Chairman, without underestimating the importance of the fortifications appropriation bill, to call the committee's attention to a subject that in point of gravity and point of importance to this country and its protection against foreign and domestic danger is far superior and altogether outweighs the questions of the fortifications bill in time of tranquillity and peace. I hold before me the Chicago Record-Herald of the dates of January 17 and 18, 1913. The first caption is "Feeble-minded white girl married to a 42-year old negro."

Some time ago I addressed a few remarks to the House touching the marriage in Chicago of the negro pugilist, Johnson, to an unfortunate white woman. It was then said by a good many Members that it was a rare case, an isolated case. I said on that occasion that it was a remarkable case that attracted wide attention. Such marriages are, however, not an uncommon occurrence, too frequent in Illinois, and too frequent elsewhere. I hold here the marriage certificate of this late outrage. Upon inspection of it there appears the gentle white hand of a woman and the strong white hand of a man, each upraised with fingers touching each other over an open Bible. These words immediately follow this holy emblem:

> This is to certify that George F. Thompson, of Chicago, State of Illinois, and Hellen E. Hanson, of Chicago, State of Illinois, were by me united in holy matrimony, according to the ordinance of God and the laws of the State of Michigan, at Niles, on the 13th day of January, A. D. 1913.

That unholy certificate is signed by two witnesses to the ceremony and underwritten by "Charles Ager, minister of the gospel." A white minister at that, who ought to be tarred and feathered and driven into exile, scorned, as he is, by all decent people. Look upon this certificate, gentlemen, and you will witness the binding in wedlock of a 42-year-old negro to a 15-year-old feeble-minded white American girl, according to the laws of the State of Michigan, and conformable to the statutes of the State of Illinois. I desire to read a few extracts from the newspaper report of this case and incorporate them in the RECORD:

> It became known that Thompson took the girl to Niles from Hammond, Ind., arriving at 4.30 o'clock in the morning of January 14. He hid the child in a room at the Forler House in the railroad district. At 10 o'clock the next morning he visited L. J. Torney, a justice of the peace, and asked him to perform the wedding ceremony.

To the credit of the justice, let it be said, he refused. Later he secured the services of the alleged white minister.

Another report from the paper says:

> The girl is the only daughter of a widow who lives at 3855 Wentworth Avenue, and who conducts a little grocery at Thirty-eighth and South States Streets. The little girl helped her mother around the store while not attending school. She is small for her age, and still does her hair in a braid and wears short dresses.

My God, that the laws of any civilized State will permit a bestial brute to invade the home of a poor and defenseless widow, and, in defiance of her, to have sanctioned by law his wedlock to such a pitiable child! [Applause.]

The published report says further:

> Thompson, who is a widower and who has two children, saw the child two weeks ago. He frequently went to the grocery and bought the child candy and ribbons. On January 10 he bought her a big doll which opened and shut its eyes and "talked." The child was delighted. When he asked her to go with him to the home of a negro friend, William Price, of 6630 Throop Street, late in the afternoon, the child was willing. She took her doll with her. Thompson kept her at Price's home all night.

It is sufficient to arouse the Nation that a 42-year-old African negro can take to another negro's home a 15-year-old feeble-minded child and keep her all night, and then, having wed her, outrage her, leave her dying, and escape violence of brave men in a great city. How long will the legislators of these States remain recreant to public duty? After the marriage he was arrested. Let me read on:

> After a physician had found Emma Hanson, whom Thompson had married, in the negro's home, at 3820 La Salle Street, apparently dying, the child was removed secretly to a hospital by agents of the Juvenile Protective League and has not since recovered consciousness.
> Thompson is being held in the county jail pending the outcome of the child's injuries. He is formally charged with abduction and his preliminary hearing has been set for January 24 before Judge Courtney.

Gentlemen, you may understand how this can be, but it passes my comprehension how any venal brute can marry a helpless, enfeebled white child and ever find lodgment in a jail or confinement in police barracks. All law-abiding men abhor violence in disregard of law, but what ought to be done with this beast propriety makes it impossible to state. When I cited to you the Johnson marriage in December I then stated that unless action was taken this outrage would inevitably lead to others. Here is what the black brute, Thompson, says, according to the published report:

> Thompson, in his cell in the county jail, yesterday told why he lured the slip of a girl from her home and married her. He said he had a right to take the girl for his wife "if Jack Johnson could marry Lucile Cameron."
> "If I want that girl, why can't I have her? I married her, and what are they going to do about it?"

I do not know what they will do about it in Michigan or Chicago, but I do know what they would do about it in Georgia. Propriety again will not permit me to say. He goes on insolently in these words:

> I wanted her and I got her. Her mother is raving because I am colored. She thinks I ain't good enough. But if Jack Johnson is good enough to marry white women, why can't I marry one?

There you have it, sirs. In the name of girlhood and womanhood, I appeal to the recreant States to take action. Let the people call on their servants for legislation. I am happy to note that Kansas last week passed through the house a bill prohibiting such marriages.

Gentlemen, if others will not follow, do you not think we had better pass the constitutional amendment offered by me a few weeks ago prohibiting forever the marriage of whites and negroes in this country? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes and a half to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the West has been the object of more poison-pointed javelins than any other section of the country, and especially our agricultural interests. I want to call the attention of the chairman and of the House to a significant statement made by Dr. Galloway, of the Bureau of Plant Industry, in a hearing upon the 17th day of this month concerning irrigated agricultural lands.

I will print that in the RECORD. In short, it means that, in his opinion, irrigated lands soon wear out. The view presented by Dr. Galloway is a blow not only to all the irrigated and irrigable lands in the West and every farmer who owns a tract of land that is being irrigated, but it is a blow also given to the great reclamation projects which we have now in process of construction in the West. In that connection I want to print as a part of my remarks extracts from practical farmers who have irrigated their farms for as much as 40 years, and, contrary to the statement of Dr. Galloway, their farms have grown more productive and valuable. It is a natural source of fertilization, the spreading of the waters upon the land, and I also want in this connection to give this testimony personally that for 35 years I have been irrigating lands, and my crops have grown from year to year under this natural fertilization by the spreading of the waters upon the land.

I am aware of the fact that there is a little bit of testimony that Dr. Galloway might bring to his aid drawn from the way-off eastern countries where irrigation first started, but those lands, supposed to have deteriorated in value, did not deteriorate because of irrigation, but, on the contrary, it was because of the exhaustion of the water supply by denuding the forests at the high country, thereby drying up the springs and natural reservoirs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I also ask to print an editorial appearing in the Rocky Mountain News, the most reliable and most widely circulated paper in the Rocky Mountain and semiarid regions, concerning conservation in the western section of our country, showing all that the West asks for at the hands of the incoming administration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to incorporate certain articles in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The articles referred to are as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Are any of the lands reclaimed by irrigation now being lost to agriculture?
Dr. GALLOWAY. From alkali?
The CHAIRMAN. From any causes.
Dr. GALLOWAY. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. From the action of saturation wearing it out?
Dr. GALLOWAY. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. Then, as a matter of fact, some of the land that is being reclaimed is also being lost to agriculture?
Dr. GALLOWAY. Yes, sir; that is true.
The CHAIRMAN. To any marked degree?
Dr. GALLOWAY. To a marked degree.
The CHAIRMAN. As a matter of fact, do irrigated lands have their problems which affect their own life and production to the degree that humid lands have?
Dr. GALLOWAY. Far more so, in my judgment. I will even go so far as to say what I have said before, that as far as I know there has never been any long-continued successful irrigation agriculture in an arid climate anywhere in the world.

COLORADO FARMERS LAUGH AT DR. GALLOWAY—PROVE IRRIGATED LAND PRODUCES BEST RESULTS—UNANIMOUS REPLY FROM EXPERTS REFUTES STATEMENT THAT ARTIFICIALLY WATERED AREAS DO NOT LAST LONG.

Colorado farmers and agricultural experts are virtually unanimous in their denunciation of the statement credited to Dr. B. F. Galloway in his testimony before a committee of the National House of Representatives to the effect that agriculture can not be carried on successfully for a long time under irrigation.

Farmers in the northern Colorado and Arkansas Valley districts, where irrigation has been practiced for more than 50 years, agree that the lands which have been longest irrigated are now producing the best yields.

Colorado farmers in the irrigated districts are eager that the testimony of Dr. Galloway be contradicted at once lest its falsity do permanent harm to the State among people who have no knowledge of irrigation. Most of them agree that the doctor has studied irrigation only "through a field glass from a palace-car window."

Following are some expressions from men who have made a competency from farming by irrigation in Colorado, and who know whereof they speak:

BUMPER CROPS IN WELD PROVE IRRIGATION—FARMERS, INDIGNANT AT GALLOWAY, POINT TO YIELDS ON LAND LONG WATERED.

GREELEY, January 26.

Farmers of Weld County who have accumulated fortunes by tilling land are indignant at the statement credited to Dr. B. G. Galloway, Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, who asserts that irrigated lands in the West are deteriorating as the result of being cultivated for a period of years.

There is no grave problem confronting Weld County from this cause, and unusually large yields this year in every crop, with the sole exception of potatoes, farmers say, prove conclusively that the Government expert is grossly misinformed.

N. D. Bartholomew, who has farmed in Weld County for 25 years, and who has accumulated a fortune, said:

"Our land to-day is better than it was 40 years ago or 25 years ago either. It produces better than it once did."

S. A. Bradfield, a pioneer of Greeley, said: "This is the pioneer irrigated section of Colorado. I stand firm in the opinion that there is no better farming country than in this section, and I deny emphatically that the soil is not as good as it ever was; in fact, I know from my own experience that it is a great deal richer and better."

More than a quarter of a million acres are under irrigation in Weld County. Irrigation has been practiced here since 1870 and the territory has been steadily increasing. Land is worth from $200 to $300 an acre, and water rights vary in price from $500 to $3,000.

LORY EXPLAINS STATEMENT—DECLARES PROBLEMS OF IRRIGATION WILL BE SOLVED.

FORT COLLINS, January 26.

President Charles A. Lory, of Colorado Agricultural College, when asked to-night for a statement regarding Dr. B. T. Galloway's declaration that there is danger of deterioration of soils under irrigation, said:

"Dr. Galloway's statement should not be interpreted in terms applicable to agriculture under humid conditions. His claim before the House committee was that the methods of humid agriculture would not be successful in irrigated culture. Irrigated agriculture has problems peculiarly its own. They present no greater difficulty than the problem of humid agriculture."

GRAND VALLEY SOIL, WATERED 30 YEARS, BETTER THAN EVER—GRAND JUNCTION EXPERTS DECLARE PROPER IRRIGATION CAN NOT INJURE LAND.

GRAND JUNCTION, COLO., January 26.

That systematic and scientific irrigation in no way injures the soil of the Grand Valley is the statement of leading irrigation experts in Grand Junction. They admit that indiscriminate use of water and negligence on the part of landowners is injurious to the land, but this can be easily overcome by drainage. In connection with the $4,000,000 Grand Valley project which is being built by the Government, a mammoth drainage system is also under way, which will cost $500,000 and free the Grand Valley from all fear of seepage in the future.

"No land will be injured by irrigation," declared E. E. Udlock, a landholder, "if any degree of care is taken in handling it. There is land here which has been under cultivation 30 years which is as rich now as any in the world. It lies on the river bottom, too, where seepage would most likely occur."

"I've farmed my ranch for 25 years," declared R. A. Orr, "and the land is better to-day than when I started. I do my own irrigating or supervise it."

"My ranch is 3 miles east of town and is in a rather low spot," declared M. M. Morse, "but seepage is no bugaboo to me. If I turned the water in my orchard for days at a time without looking after it, the soil would become water logged. Any land would, in any place. I am not bothered with alkali."

Much low land in the valley which went to seep before scientific irrigation was known is now being reclaimed.

COLORADO AND CONSERVATION.

It has been suggested that the chamber of commerce shall send 100 representative citizens to Washington to acquaint President Wilson with Colorado's views on conservation in order that the present "policy of disuse" may be abated, and a wiser and more sympathetic administration of the public domain inaugurated in the Western States.

Whether this plan is carried out or not, it is imperative that Colorado should do something to ameliorate the hardships worked upon the State by Pinchotism and to avert the danger of additional legislation based on ignorance and misunderstanding.

The theorists and bureau experts are already at work, and nothing is more necessary than that their misrepresentations shall not be allowed to poison President Wilson as they poisoned Taft and Roosevelt. Even now the eastern press is charging that "the enemies of conservation" are rallying to attack the whole conservation movement "on the partisan political ground that it is a Roosevelt movement." And Colorado is prominently mentioned as one of the "enemies."

This is not the truth nor has it ever been the truth. Colorado is not antagonistic to the policy of conservation, but is only insisting that it be freed from some apparent evils that have prevented the proper growth and development of this State.

For the East to assume that Colorado is working hand in hand with land grabbers and speculators is an insult to a State that has made a more strenuous fight against special privilege than any other in the Union.

It is to put the public domain into the possession of individual users that Colorado is struggling, and in this struggle there is not the slightest intent to "enrich a few people" or to open the way to huge grabs and ruthless exploitation of the natural resources. In his inaugural address Gov. Ammons put Colorado's position in a nutshell. He said:

"I believe in conservation in the meaning of the prevention of waste and monopoly. I am unalterably opposed to it in its definition of preserving things in their natural state undeveloped for future generations.

"I am also opposed to putting our lands and resources on a tenantry basis to pay taxes into the Federal Treasury. We will never be able to settle our lands and improve them properly unless the people can own them. * * *

"More than half the territory of Colorado and probably more than 90 per cent of the resources, outside of land, are still in Government ownership. To place these on a tenantry basis to pay rental into the Federal Treasury is to withdraw them permanently from State and local taxation. The people, therefore, who must supply county governments and State institutions must pay not only their own just share of taxes, but also those avoided by the Federal property."

It is against these repressions and obstacles that Colorado is protesting and will continue to protest until injustices are remedied. Our people have grown weary of seeing their greatest problem decided in the East, where there is no such problem, and by eastern men who have neither knowledge nor sympathy. We feel that we have a right to share in the decisions that affect the State so vitally and to protest against these decisions when they are stupid and unjust.

Vast changes are taking place under our very eyes, and yet no recognition of them is made in Washington. The "grazing lease," for instance, is now outgrown and has become intolerable. We have found that the waste stretches once deemed usable only for range are fertile in the extreme and available for agricultural purposes. Emmer, the new wheat, means ripening harvests where once the lone steer had to crop acres for subsistence. Other discoveries bid fair to change the whole face of things in Colorado, and yet it is insisted, in the sacred interests of conservation, that we shall govern ourselves according to rules laid down in the past.

The governmental position with regard to water is a case in point also. The fear that water power may become "monopolized" has developed into a mania. In the very nature of the element it is not possible to monopolize water power, for its use for this purpose works no miraculous disappearance. It is still there, still susceptible to use by others. And out of this ridiculous fear has developed a policy that regards every applicant for any such privilege as a thief and an enemy.

Colorado wants landowners and home builders. Under conservation, as the bureaucrats administer it, Colorado is barred from getting either. Not until the prospector is given the hope of owning the mine that he discovers, not until the old homestead law pushes the "grazing lease" out of existence, can Colorado achieve its destiny.

Gov. Wilson has already stated that he is for conservation not reservation. Let a Colorado delegation prove to him that this State has had nothing but reservation and there is small doubt but that his fairness will agree to a change.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, on the 18th day of this month in the Canadian Parliament a bill was pending for the organization of the Canadian navy, and while it was under discussion a gentleman representing the north Ontario district, a Conservative in politics, the Hon. Samuel Simpson Sharpe by name, took an active part in the discussion thereof. He opposed the bill and took occasion to deliver himself on the personnel of the American Navy. The Washington Post of the 19th day of this month published his speech, and I quote therefrom the following extract:

Few native Americans sign for the Navy, and those who do are desperate. Men who are no good socially, morally, and otherwise. A hard winter, hard times, and strikes make the best recruiting seasons for the United States Navy. Thus it becomes a sort of home for destitutes and moral degenerates. Deserters from foreign ships—Scandinavians, Russians, Finns, Austrians, and Latins—take kindly to the Yankee Navy, for in it they learn the language and a trade, and the life to them is easy compared with their previous existence.

Mr. Chairman, the enemies of Bob Ingersoll said that he was an agnostic because he did not know anything about the future world. The Hon. Samuel Simpson Sharpe, upon the same line of reasoning, must be an agnostic, because he does not know anything about this world, especially about the personnel of the American Navy. The full complement of the American Navy is 51,500 men. There are to-day 47,515 enlisted men in our Navy; 42,857 are American-born citizens, 2,875 are naturalized foreigners, and 128 unnaturalized foreigners have made application for citizenship; 96.25 per cent of our entire naval force are American citizens and 90.20 per cent are American born. For more than six long years the American Navy has not admitted foreigners into its service except those who were members thereof before we required American citizenship as a qualification to enter our Navy

It would seem, Mr. Chairman, from these figures, that instead of the American Navy being a recruiting station for moral degenerates and deserters from foreign ships that it is a place where the best citizens of this land seek an opportunity to render honorable service in defense of this country. More than 73,000 men during the year 1912 offered their services to become members of the American Navy and only 17,743 were admitted, because of the high standard which is required in the examination before one can enter our Navy. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to throw any reflections upon our sister on our north or upon any of her citizens, but I resent the statement made by this Canadian legislator as a slander upon the personnel of our Navy, and suggest that he acquaint himself with facts before he delivers himself again upon this subject. I want to advise him that the American Navy stands among the best navies in the world, while not as large as some, but among the best and bravest. Whoever heard of braver language more courageously delivered than that of Capt. Lawrence, of the Chesapeake, in deadly conflict with the British Shannon in 1813, when, wounded and dying, he uttered these immortal words, "Don't give up the ship."

It has been the motto of the American sailor ever since, both at home and abroad. No history has been made brighter in any nation of this world than the record of the deeds of valor of the American Navy. [Applause.] The report which was sent by Commodore Perry of his naval victory on Lake Erie in 1813, "We have met the enemy and they are ours," is an index of the courage and of the bravery of the American soldiers and American sailors.

Our ships float into every clime, on every water, and in every port in the world, and have made for us a reputation as the bravest among the brave, always ready for any emergency on land or on sea, and he who speaks disparagingly either of our Navy or of our Army does it either because he is ignorant of the conditions in America or because he wants to slander the greatest Nation in the world.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ESCH. Is it not a fact that when our fleet made its trip around the world and the men of the fleet were granted shore leave, their conduct met with the praise and commendation of the citizens and authorities of every port and nation they visited?

Mr. FOWLER. I am glad the gentleman propounded that question, Mr. Chairman, because I intended to allude to some of the great incidents of the American Navy, among which was the trip around the world mentioned by the gentleman. In every port where that great fleet landed it was hailed with greetings by crowned heads, and our sailors were received in the highest circles. If you want to know the bravery of men, go ask the wreck of our splendid ship the Maine, which was blown up in the Harbor of Habana; ask the remains of the dead seamen, 223, who gave up their lives on the high seas that men might be free.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have an extension of time of two and one-half minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. The time was fixed in the House, and it is not in the power of the committee to fix general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that when the time for general debate is fixed in the House the committee has no power to extend it by unanimous consent.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take up time in the discussion of this bill under the five-minute rule for this purpose, but I will be compelled to take the time then instead of now.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask for the regular order, which is the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sums of money herein provided for be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available and to continue available until expended, namely:

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The personnel of the American Navy ought never to be called into question.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the matter before the committee, and, therefore, is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman understands the bill is being read for amendment, and it is not in order to discuss anything except the matter before the committee.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation provided here is for the purpose of protecting the American Navy——

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given an extension of time. My belief is that he will ask for only two and one-half minutes, and if it is refused it will consume more time than if you permit him to have those two or three minutes. I therefore ask that he be given unanimous consent to continue for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was made that he was not discussing the subject in the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I ask unanimous consent——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] be permitted to discuss other subjects.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, at the special request of the gentleman from Illinois, general debate, which was then about to be closed and could have been closed, in my judgment, by a motion, was permitted to extend so as to give him the maximum of the time that he requested. I have no desire except to perform the public business of the country. I submit that we have reached the time in this House when the desire of the gentlemen to speak on general subjects should not be permitted to interfere with the public business before the Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky object?

Mr. SHERLEY. I make the point of order it is not in order to give unanimous consent after the question has been settled by the House.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I submit that there has been much time wasted.

The CHAIRMAN. The matter is not debatable. The Chair understands that it is out of order to discuss general subjects at this time. The committee may grant unanimous consent to do so. The question is on the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] to give three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] to discuss general subjects at this time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman to whom I have alluded as a member of the Canadian Parliament wants to know anything about the personnel or the marksmanship of the American Navy, I ask him to consult the remains of the Vizcaya, the Cristobal Colon, the Maria Theresa, the Oquendo, the Pluton, and the Furor, now lying at the bottom of the sea off the Harbor of Santiago Bay. If the gentleman had only made himself acquainted with the history of the Spanish-American War he might have saved himself the criticism of having slandered the American Navy.

Mr. Chairman, it is well known by everybody that the great trip which the Oregon made, in charge of Capt. Clark, around the Horn, in order to engage in the memorable battle on the 3d day of July, 1898, has become historical, and every student of history knows that that daring deed compares favorably with any naval event of any fleet or any other war vessel in the world.

I say, Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the gentleman in the Canadian Parliament is a slander upon the personnel of the American Navy, and I challenge him and the world to show a higher citizenship in the Navy in any country, in any clime, upon any vessel, and in any battle than that which has been displayed by the personnel of the American Navy. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the procurement or reclamation of land, or right pertaining thereto, needed for site, location, construction, or prosecution of works for fortifications and coast defenses, $100,000.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. GILLETT. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] in charge of the bill if this is the paragraph to purchase the land on Chesapeake Bay?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is.

Mr. GILLETT. This project for the defense of the entrance to Chesapeake Bay has been pressed upon the Committee on Appropriations by the War Department ever since I have been on that committee. I remember that about 10 years ago the committee went down the bay, as I believe it has done this year, and investigated personally the conditions there, and every year from then until now this project has been pressed upon the committee, and every year until now the committee has rejected it. This is the first time that a favorable report has ever been made upon it.

That illustrates the great advantage which the Army and Navy always have in finally accomplishing their projects, because the Army and Navy are always steadfast to their opinions. They are always here, while the membership of this House is shifting; and some year, if they press it year after years, as has happened in the case of this and so many other projects, they will find a committee that is favorable. Then the proposition will be reported, and that project, if it is once under way, is bound to be completed, and then they can devote their energies and persistence to some other project which the House up to date has rejected.

But, of course, that is no argument, necessarily, against this project. We all have the right to change our minds, and different committees can have different opinions. But I wish to call the attention of the committee first to the proposition that the main ground upon which this is reported is that the Army and Navy are unanimous for it. That proposition has been equally true ever since I have been on this committee. They have recommended the defense of the entrance to Chesapeake Bay, and the delegation from Virginia, naturally and properly, have always urged it upon the committee.

But what is the reason for defending the entrance of the Chesapeake Bay? Unquestionably the cities of that bay are as well defended as any in the country to-day. We have Fortress Monroe, we have the defenses of Baltimore, we have the defenses of Washington all completed, and all within the original project of the Endicott Board, wherein this defense at the entrance of the bay was reported as an outer defense. The original project, or the project that was pressed upon us for many years, was that an artificial island should be constructed at the entrance of the bay. In that way the deep-water channel could be absolutely covered and defended against an approaching hostile fleet.

That unquestionably would be better than to fortify Cape Henry, but the expense would be very large, and I presume it was upon that ground that the subcommittee now have abandoned the island project, which would be a much stronger defense, but which would be a more expensive project, and it is doubtless upon that ground that we now have proposed simply a fortification upon Cape Henry and none on Cape Charles.

Now, the entrance to Chesapeake Bay is 12 miles wide, but the deep-water channel comes within about 5 miles of Cape Henry, so that if modern guns are erected upon that cape, as this project, I understand, proposes, the deep-water channel will be adequately protected.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. I ask that my time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETT. Beyond this deep-water channel are 7 miles of shoal water, but in that shoal water there are channels 18 to 23 feet deep, so that the scout boats of the enemy and the transports of the enemy can still come in, and the Army engineers tell us that despite these fortifications on Cape Henry it will be necessary to have a flotilla of armored vessels of the scout size in Chesapeake Bay to protect it against the scouts and transports of the enemy. So that we are not absolutely defending it, and I venture to predict that just as soon as this project is completed the Army and Navy will tell us that it is necessary to have another battery over upon the other cape, and the reason they do not say so now is because they are willing to accept this project and partially defend it, and then I predict we will be asked to fortify the other cape, and thus absolutely cover the channel.

Now, I recognize that we would all like to have that bay protected. We would like every bay along the coast protected, but I recognize the truth of what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] says, that after all you can not lay down a hard and fast rule as to what you shall defend. It is a good deal like a man's life insurance or fire insurance. Different men will have different opinions as to how adequately you should insure. The same man at different times may have different opinions, and so this committee at different times has shown that it has, and some members of the committee have had different opinions upon this very project.

But in my opinion this is not a necessary project, because the cities of the bay are now all well protected. Lynnhaven Bay could be used by a hostile fleet to be sure as a refuge, but we can not shut up all the bays on the Atlantic from hostile fleets. If we shut up Chesapeake Bay, there are plenty of other undefended bays to which a hostile fleet can go, and where they can take refuge. So we are not preventing them having a base on the Atlantic coast. Why, then, should we go to this expense of $3,500,000 to fortify the entrance of a bay whose cities are all admirably fortified? It seems to me that while our present coast defenses are not completed, while it now requires $21,000,000 to complete the fire control, the modernizing of the equipments, the searchlights, and the electrical installations of the forts that we have on our coasts, while so much money as that still remains to be expended and ought to be provided to make them serviceable, it is foolish for us to launch out into a new project costing between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000. And it strikes me it is particularly strange that the Democratic majority, which refuses to increase the size of the Army, which says it is going to diminish the appropriations for military defenses, should come forward with this project, which necessarily increases the Coast Artillery force to protect Chesapeake Bay, because to-day the Coast Artillery force is grossly inadequate. And we all know that the Coast Artillery are not like an ordinary army. We can not recruit them at a moment and have them serviceable. The Coast Artillery is more like the Navy. This country has lately decided that it is not the number of guns we have, but it is the number of hits we can make that count. So in the Coast Artillery you have got to have skilled men. You can not recruit them at the moment of war as you can our ordinary army. You have got to have men who can make the guns tell. They will be needed at the very outbreak of the war and must know how to manage their guns at the very first approach of the enemy.

Now, in what condition is our Coast Artillery to-day? The Coast Artillery report says that to give not a war force, but just one single manning for our present home coast defenses, would require 44,000 men, and all we have to-day to man those present existing forts is 21,000 men. So that there is to-day a lack of 23,000 men to give just one manning to our present home Artillery force.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I will ask for an extension of five minutes more and then I will request no further extension.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. As I understand the gentleman's argument, he is suggesting a large increase, about 50 per cent, in the Coast Artillery Corps?

Mr. GILLETT. It seems to me that there ought to be at least that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have been told by a general officer of the United States Army that it is the policy of some governments not to maintain at their full strength Coast Artillery organizations, because it is a character of work that can be supplemented by laborers and intelligent mechanics, assuming, of course, that a skeleton of trained men is kept to direct these people. A general officer of the United States Army gave me that information, if it is information.

Mr. GILLETT. All I know is what the chief of our Coast Artillery says, and he makes the point that the Coast Artillery men are men that you can not recruit at once, but that experience is necessary to make them useful.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman knows that if he goes to the head of the Cavalry arm, or an officer of the Infantry arm, or of the Artillery, that he will try to convince him that the country is going to the devil in short order if that particular arm of the service is not augmented.

Mr. GILLETT. I will agree with the gentleman; and I do not blame the Army officers for that tendency, because no man in a professional line is worth much if he does not exaggerate, even to himself, the importance of his line. They ought to be enthusiastic. It is true that the board that is planning our coast defense are very apt to exaggerate—and that is an argument really against this project—because they are apt to overexaggerate the need of defense. We can see why it is, and probably we would do the same thing if we were in their place, because in case of war if a disaster happens in any one spot they want to be able to say, "We recommended to Congress that that spot should be defended, and therefore it is Congress and not we that are to blame." I presume it is true that the chief of every division will exaggerate the importance of his recommendation; but it does seem to me that when to-day it requires simply to man once our present existing coast defense 44,000 men, and we have only 21,000 for that purpose, that is an argument that before we branch out to inaugurate new defenses we ought, at least, to complete the old and to complete the manning of the old.

Moreover, the existing defenses are not worth anything unless they have men who can shoot these guns with accuracy; and also they are not useful unless they have the fire control, the searchlights, and power plants, and all the other appurtenances which go to-day to make up a great fortification. There is now lacking $21,000,000 to complete all these; so it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that now is a strange time to take up this new project, which has been before us and rejected so many years.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman think it would be an excellent idea to supplement our defenses with treaties of arbitration with all the governments of the world?

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, I am as much in favor of that as anybody could be, and would be glad to do it, but I recognize the uncertainty of war. We may not need these defenses, and we may need them. We have to exercise a certain elasticity of judgment, and many men will differ. I have stated my opinion that this defense is not imperatively necessary and we should still postpone it as it has been postponed so many years.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether there were elaborate plans made for this proposed fortification, what they are, and what it is going to cost?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, in answering the gentleman from Massachusetts I shall endeavor to give the gentleman from Illinois the information he asks for. The gentleman from Massachusetts has truly said that this proposal has been before Congress for some 10 years, but he draws from that fact a very different conclusion than I would draw from it. He says, having been before Congress for 10 years and Congress having heretofore not agreed to it, it should not agree to it now.

But I submit in all candor that the very fact that in the face of repeated refusals of Congress to agree to the project—not just the project now before the committee, but one touching the fortification of the Chesapeake—the Army and the Navy have given the best evidence of the importance of it, from their viewpoint, and I present now to this House this question, and it seems to me fundamental, whether we, as laymen, are going to put our judgment as to a strategic matter of this kind against the judgment of men trained to determine it, after that determination has become fixed and the plan has become a detailed one, and when, in my judgment, the present plan also answers the objections that heretofore have been made. The original proposition that was submitted to this Congress was contained in the report of the Endicott Board. It did not report that the defenses of Washington or Baltimore or of Norfolk were sufficient in themselves, but it recommended at that time as the only practical way of defending the mouth of the Chesapeake, the stationing of certain monitors there. That proposition was revised by the Taft Board; that board recommended the building of an artificial island, and the placing of batteries upon Cape Charles and Cape Henry.

Mr. Chairman, no subject has gone through a greater evolution than the art of seacoast defense. The range of guns, the accuracy of fire, particularly the accuracy of fire of mortars, to-day compared with the old days have revolutionized seacoast defense, and more and more as the warships have had heavier armament and heavier armor has the tendency been to increase the size of our guns and their range, so that to-day, instead of having a proposition with all of the uncertainty that was involved in a project to build an artificial island, the cost of which nobody knew, and the sufficiency of which no one could then determine, we have now a proposition that contemplates the use of armament of sufficient caliber and sufficient range to cover the mouth of the Chesapeake; and the gentleman is not accurate when he says that it will be impossible for the guns upon Cape Henry to control the field at the mouth of the Chesapeake. It is about 12 miles from Cape Henry to Cape Charles. A modern 16-inch gun will be able to cover entirely that field, and that is also true of the modern mortars that it is proposed to station there; and when that is supplemented with the mine defense, I say to you that the testimony of the officers showed that it would be an adequate defense.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not mean that 12 miles can be covered by a battery with an effective defense?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not mean to say that the actual 12 miles can, but I mean to say that the entire usable channel can.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; the deep water. That is 5 miles.

Mr. SHERLEY. Not only the deep water, but what the gentleman has spoken of as of less depth, for transports, will be within the field of the range of the 16-inch guns, and it was so testified before our committee.

[The time of Mr. SHERLEY having expired, by unanimous consent he was granted five minutes more.]

Mr. Chairman, the proposition that confronts us is this: It is true that the fortifications of Fort Monroe, that the fortifications upon the Potomac, that the fortifications at Baltimore, protect Washington and Baltimore from sea attack; but it is not the purpose of this fortification at the mouth of the Chesapeake to simply protect those cities from sea attack. This is the proposition that underlies the whole matter. You have a great harbor for the rendezvous of ships. At Lynnhaven Bay is one of the greatest anchorages upon the Atlantic coast. There is not now mounted a single gun upon the Atlantic shore that could in any way prevent a fleet, assuming that it was not interfered with by our fleet, anchoring in Lynnhaven Bay, and making a safe base for operations there in the Chesapeake. The very purpose of defense is to leave your Navy free to seek the enemy. If you have here at home a safe rendezvous that a foreign navy can use for operations, you have presented a situation that would compel in the breaking out of war the bringing of part of your fleet to prevent the use of this rendezvous by another fleet.

Not only is that so, but in the event of an indeterminate action between the American fleet and a foreign fleet, you need to go into some place for refuge, and as a refuge this is in many ways the most attractive place upon the Atlantic coast, and it would be at any time to our fleet. I grant you that it is hard for a lay mind, and I share the difficulty, to contemplate a situation where our fleet might be so destroyed that the enemy's fleet would be at liberty to make landing parties of great size, to bring transports and troops, and take, by overland, any of those cities.

And yet the War of 1812 presented just exactly that proposition, and it was through this entrance that the forces were landed and marched on to the Capitol and burned it. Now, the gentleman says there are plenty of harbors that are not fortified that can be used. The gentleman's information is better than mine, as I can not recall any harbor, and I call on him now to say what harbor there is near the Chesapeake that is undefended that could be used as a rendezvous by a hostile fleet.

Mr. GILLETT. I did not say near the Chesapeake, but what is the matter with the Delaware breakwater?

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman think that behind the Delaware breakwater a fleet could lie?

Mr. GILLETT. Why, I think so.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman mean to say they could make that a base for operations?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not see why not. It is not as good as Lynn Haven Bay, but it is satisfactory. There are a number of undefended harbors also in New England they could get into. Of course, those are not near the Chesapeake.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think there is no question but that a fleet could be accommodated behind the breakwater if the breakwater were dredged out, but the difficulty is now it has shoaled up to a certain extent, and we have been unable to have those shoals removed.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am speaking of conditions as we have them to-day. I am not advised of any place that is comparable in its importance and in its availability as the Chesapeake. Now, the gentleman says we should not undertake this matter until we have brought up all the units of our defense, and he cites to you the fact that twenty-odd million dollars is needed now for the defenses we already have.

Now, the gentleman is again mistaken. It is true that estimates exist looking to the expenditure of something like $27,000,000 for what might be designated as accessories to our coast defenses, but it is unfair again to assume, because the estimates exist for these additional needs, that therefore the present defense is inadequate. For instance, we have at present at practically all of these fortifications temporary fire control, a fire control that is sufficient in time of war, but yet not the permanent system that is proposed to be installed for all time. So is it true in regard to the searchlights. We have not all we ought to have and all we will have, but the gentleman is not warranted in giving the impression to this House that other places are so in need of money for accessories that you should not expend the money here. Now, we are actually proposing to expend somewhere between $100,000 and $150,000. I have frankly stated to the committee that in my judgment the expenditure in the final run will amount to nearly $4,000,000, if not quite that sum.

I present to you this proposition: That there is unanimity on the part of Army and Navy officers, first, as to the necessity for defending the lower Chesapeake; second, as to the efficiency of the proposed defense; third, as to the great size and value of the commerce that uses those waters; fourth, as to the stake that we have there in the Norfolk Navy Yard; fifth, as to the great cities of Washington, the Capital of the Nation, Norfolk, and Baltimore; that it is not an extreme position to say that the Government, having embarked upon millions and millions of expenditure for national defense, shall undertake this project, calling for $4,000,000, that has back of it all of this at stake. Because of all this, I did not feel I should put my judgment against the judgment of these officers. I had a good deal of the feeling of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and a large part of it was due to the fact that at one time the project did not present what seemed to be feasible. They came to us with an artificial-island proposal when we did not know what the character of the foundation was upon which it was to be built or the amount of money that it was to cost. They came to us at a time when our range of guns was very limited as compared to what it is now.

There were many reasons why we were warranted, and I defend the action of the committee in the past, in having refused to agree to the project; but I believe we have reached a time when the project is sufficiently advanced to enable us to judge clearly and realize that it will be adequate, and I am not willing, with the responsibility put upon me, to put my judgment against these officers. Now, much is said about Army and Navy officers always desiring to do various unjustifiable things, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] very properly qualifies his suggestion by saying they ought to be zealous, but I deny that our Army and Navy officers are simply seeking an opportunity to spend money. I think they have spent a great deal, and a great deal for which we did not get a proper return, but taking them man for man I believe they rank as high in intelligence, in patriotism, and in desire to serve the interests of our country as any of the citizens of America, and their integrity is beyond question.

They come from the body of us, they come from our congressional districts, and there is no reason why they should have imputed to them always the motive of desiring their own interest when they make a recommendation to the Congress of the United States. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts may not be agreed to.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

When this bill was before the House on a former occasion, in the endeavor to get some information about our method of maintaining our coast defenses, I asked my colleague, the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. SHERLEY], some questions, and among them was this one:

In case a shell was dropped over behind this embankment or protection or rampart and should explode in proximity to these guns, what probable effect would the débris thrown up have upon the machinery for raising and lowering these guns?

The answer was:

I should say, if it was a big enough shell and exploded close enough, it would put the gun out of commission.

Now, I do not pose as an expert. I have no training or knowledge whatever of war or of the machinery of war, but I ask this committee if that statement does not present some food for thought, and is it not worth while to consider it?

If I understand the way in which these guns are operated, they are operated from behind a bank, something similar to the walls here that support this balcony. The guns are down here, and have machinery with which to lift them above the top of the embankment behind which they are concealed. They are lifted, fired, and then are immediately lowered. I presume these coast-defense guns are of different caliber.

I have received information from a source that I consider reliable that guns of very small caliber are established at some of these coast-defense stations, and it was represented to me by an officer who was in this particualr branch of the Army, that some of the guns that are behind these places are inferior in caliber, range, and effectiveness to the guns carried and fired by a dreadnought or man-of-war, or, to put it as concretely as I can, that a man-of-war could stand off at sea and thow a shell over into this emplacement, and that the gun in the emplacement on the coast did not have the range to reach the man-of-war. In other words, it would be like my engaging in a pistol duel with a man who had in his hands an improved or special "44" while I had a "22," or a Flobert rifle, or something like that, though not as extreme.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HELM. With pleasure.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman remember what happened when Port Arthur was attacked by sea? Port Arthur was in no sense as strong a fortification as ours.

Mr. HELM. I do not. I am only giving this information for what it is worth and in the utmost good faith. There is no intention of reflecting on anybody connected with the committee or any officer of the Army. It came to me in such a way that it made a strong impression on me as a matter worthy of consideration and attention, and I thought it might be worth five minutes of time to try to present it to the committee as best I could.

Mr. KOPP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. With pleasure.

Mr. KOPP. Is it not a fact that in most of our coast defenses the caliber of the guns used is much larger than the caliber of the guns used on a modern battleship, and with a much more effective range?

Mr. HELM. The only thing I can say is a repetition of what I have said, that an offier of the Army in this particular branch of it—in the coast defense division of the Army—conveyed the information to me in person that the coast-defense guns could not compete with those of the Navy. That is the best term I can use to convey my idea. He said that they did not have the reach—not all of them, but some of them—and he further said that a gun on land, the same gun and same caliber, had, by reason of its having a permanent location, a longer reach than the same caliber of gun with the same amount of powder on a vessel. Is that correct? I think I have quoted him substantially correct.

Mr. KOPP. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] has expired.

Mr. HELM. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HELM. I simply bring that out for information. It was news to me. I did not know that until the officer told it to me. I simply mentioned that to corroborate and substantiate myself in the fact that I did receive such information.

Mr. KOPP. I think the officer must have been mistaken in this respect. He may have been discussing antiquated guns or guns that were effective a few years ago, but in discussing those guns he should place against them the guns that were placed on the battleships in that day. The guns that have been placed in our fortifications lately are much more effective guns than guns carried on our battleships to-day.

Mr. HELM. Just a moment. I never saw one of these guns or these pits in which these coast-defense guns are concealed during my life. But I understand there is a gun used called the "Crozier disappearing gun." Is that correct?

Mr. KOPP. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Now, this gentleman, the officer who gave me this information, was talking to me about the Crozier disappearing gun.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Was not this the contention of the officer—and it is an old one—that we ought to use 12-inch guns at a high velocity instead of using guns of a larger caliber with larger projectiles and a less velocity? Now there are two schools of thought——

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman allow me to go on? I have but a limited time.

Mr. SHERLEY. I simply wanted to suggest to the gentleman that this was the contention: It was found that by firing a 12-inch gun at a certain velocity the tendency after a few shots was to wear the gun out; that the same velocity and impact could be had by using a larger projectile from a larger calibered gun at a less velocity, because the force of impact is determined by the weight of the projectile in connection with the velocity with which it is carried.

Mr. HELM. Now, does the gentleman want me to answer the question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, as the result of that, the 14-inch gun would last very much longer, and the Army is using a larger caliber of gun with less velocity, and the Navy is using a smaller caliber of gun at a higher velocity.

Mr. HELM. Now, in answer to the gentleman, I do not now recall that the views explained by him were touched upon by the officer giving me this information. The position that this officer seemed to take was this, if I can express it as aptly as he did: That when this shell was dropped over close to this disappearing gun, which had more or less complicated and intricate machinery to raise it and to lower it, or when a shell was dropped anywhere close to it, plowing up the ground and throwing up stones and débris generally, such as would follow such an explosion, a cloud of this débris would be thrown over or dumped upon these guns equipped with this machinery, and that stuff would get mixed up in the intricacies of the machinery, and you would have a good gun and you would have plenty of ammunition, and you would have plenty of men to operate the gun, but this trash and stones and other débris would get into this intricate machinery, prevent its operation, and put the gun out of commission.

Now, that suggested to my mind a line of thought and raised the question with me—and that is my only purpose in rising and inflicting myself on the committee—the question as to whether, if that is true, we are maintaining the right kind of guns for coast defense. And I will state, further, that this officer said and gave it as his opinion—not as mine, and it struck me with some force—that there was no reason why these guns should not stand out in the open and speak for themselves and defend themselves. I do not know; I do not put up my judgment or my opinion for anything; but if a gun is established and made stable it can not, at least, be put out of commission by reason of the débris that becomes mixed up with the intricate and involved machinery that is used in elevating and lowering it. It is a thought that is perhaps worth following up.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of opposing the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM], and I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question.

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. COX. The gentleman spoke a moment ago about these guns wearing out after being fired a certain number of times. Take the 12-inch guns. How many times can that gun be fired without wearing out?

Mr. SHERLEY. My memory is, 300 times.

Mr. COX. That is, with solid shot?

Mr. SHERLEY. With the usual projectile.

Mr. COX. Then what is done with it? Does it have to be relined?

Mr. SHERLEY. It must not be assumed that when a gun begins to wear that it is a useless gun. It simply becomes a less accurate gun, just as the gentleman knows, if he has ever shot with a rifle, that after a while the wearing of the rifling in the barrel will have the effect of interfering with the accuracy of the gun.

Mr. COX. How many shots will a 14-inch gun fire before it is worn out?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is nothing in the 14-inch gun that makes it any better than the 12-inch gun if used under similar conditions; but by using a larger projectile, with a smaller charge of powder and less velocity to the projectile, there is less wear upon the rifling, and the difference would be somewhat in proportion to the amount of powder used.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman think it would fire about as many shots as a 12-inch gun?

Mr. SHERLEY. As now used it will fire more, because the velocity is lower than in the 12-inch, and so the erosion is less. At the same velocity it would probably last as long, though I have a dim recollection—the gentleman appreciates the fact that he is questioning me concerning a very technical branch——

Mr. COX. I am; and I am asking for information, because I do not know anything about it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have a dim recollection that some one, probably Gen. Crozier, testified before our committee that there was a little difference in the life of guns, varying according to size.

Mr. COX. How much does it cost to manufacture a 12-inch gun and mount it? What is the cost complete?

Mr. SHERLEY. It costs about $128,000 for the gun and its carriage. That does not include the emplacement. That work is done by the engineers. The work done by the Ordnance Bureau, which includes the gun and its carriage, amounts to about $128,000.

Mr. COX. Does it cost about the same amount to manufacture a 14-inch gun that it does a 12-inch gun?

Mr. SHERLEY. About the same.

Now, I promised to tell the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] about the character of the armament to be placed on Cape Henry.

Mr. MANN. And where it is to be located.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is to be located at Cape Henry, almost at the end of it, so that there will be a complete control of the entire outer harbor. If the gentleman is at all familiar with that ground——

Mr. MANN. I am familiar with it.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is just beyond the lighthouse, out toward the sea, on a strip of land there. The shore line curves there, and the chord of the arc is about a mile long.

Mr. MANN. That would command the channel across between the capes, would it?

Mr. SHERLEY. Not only command the channel——

Mr. MANN. But the entrance?

Mr. SHERLEY. And the entrance, and would prevent any ships lying around near the entrance and coming suddenly into range of fire. They would be within extreme range of the gun fire. There would be no land shelter for them.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is that the channel there that is necessarily used by the vessels is close to Cape Henry, on the south side.

Mr. SHERLEY. The deeper channel is, and most war vessels would certainly have to use the deeper channel. This proposition must be borne in mind: That the commander of a ship would not unduly risk his ship unless something very great was to be gained by it. It is conceivably possible that a given ship might, under very favorable circumstances, run the fortifications, but that a sufficient number of ships could run them so as to make their doing it of any value I do not believe possible.

Mr. MANN. I was down there last summer on a revenue cutter, which was blowing up a stranded vessel, and learned by experience how it was done, and my recollection is that the captain of the revenue cutter, who was certainly fully acquainted with the methods of navigation there in the channels, stated that it was impossible for his vessel to go into the entrance at any place except through the channel which is right up against Cape Henry, and not a very wide channel at that.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is true, and the accuracy of firing of modern guns within a field of 5 or 6 miles is surpassingly great.

Mr. MANN. Certainly no battleship with a draft of over 20 feet or even less than that would have the chance of a snowflake in the lower regions to get by the fortifications on Cape Henry.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think it would be very improbable.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield for one more question.

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Cape Henry is close to Virginia Beach, a somewhat noted summer resort, and there is a summer resort right on Cape Henry. There was a time when this matter was urged before Congress when many gentlemen suspected that the people most active in urging this fortification were those who were interested in disposing to the Government at a high compensation of a summer resort that was not profitable. I take it that the gentleman's investigation has gone far enough to absolutely assure him that the necessity of this grows out of the real opinion of the War Department and not out of the desire of people to dispose of property to the Government.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have, and I will say this to the gentleman. Of course it is perfectly natural that people having property to sell, who expect to get a good price for it, should want to sell it. It is perfectly natural that people at Norfolk and the surrounding country should be anxious to have money expended on fortifications in that vicinity. Massachusetts is the only State that I have discovered, on this floor at least, that wishes that it did not have the fortifications around there to defend Boston. A gentleman from Massachusetts made that statement on the floor a few days ago, to my surprise.

This is the situation touching the land: The land is not worth anything as productive land, but by virtue of being a very attractive sand beach and being near large centers of population, the whole strip of land is rapidly being used by summer residents and hotels, not of very fine character, but in some instances of some pretension.

This particular strip of land is occupied but by very few buildings. Its probable value is, I think, somewhere between $100,000 and $130,000 or $140,000.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, I do not know how many Members may be here who were on what they call the Jamestown survivors trip two years ago, I believe, when we took luncheon at this place.

Mr. SHERLEY. That was a little bit above the point.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but very close to it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Very close to it. The actual formation of the land is such that the constant winds from the sea have been piling up the sand and drifting it back onto large forests until you have sand dunes rising to a considerable height, and when you climb to the top of them you look down upon a forest of trees, and gradually year by year the sand is encroaching more and more on the forests.

But the point I want to suggest to this committee is that there is ample protection for the Government, so far as there is ever protection for the Government, in the purchase of this land. It has power of condemnation, if it becomes necessary, and while I am as solicitous as any man here in a desire that not a penny shall be expended beyond the real value of this land, I do not believe that the question of whether we shall pay $110,000 or $130,000 for the land is a material matter in connection with the project. The value of the land is a minor factor in the whole expenditure, which will reach somewhere near $4,000,000.

Mr. MANN. How much land does the project contemplate will be required by the Government?

Mr. SHERLEY. About a mile of water front and half a mile deep.

Mr. MANN. On which water front?

Mr. SHERLEY. On Chesapeake Bay. I mean a mile of shore line and half a mile back from Chesapeake Bay.

Mr. MANN. Which shore line?

Mr. SHERLEY. From the lighthouse out toward the sea.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HAMILTON of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that to complete the record we should have a vote. The gentleman from Massachusetts moved to strike out the paragraph and it ought to be voted on.

Mr. SHERLEY. I so understood it, but was informed otherwise informally by the Chair. Did the gentleman from Massachusetts move to strike out the paragraph?

Mr. GILLETT. I think I did.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then I ask for a vote.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SHERLEY) there were 9 ayes and 29 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter estimates shall not be submitted to Congress for appropriations for construction of gun and mortar batteries, modernizing older emplacements, and other construction under the Engineer Department, in connection with fortifications and other works of defense, until after plans, specifications, and estimates of cost shall have been prepared therefor.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to that paragraph.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I also reserve the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the paragraph is clearly subject to a point of order. The purpose of the paragraph is this: In considering the estimates the committee has constantly been confronted with a condition where the engineer officers, when asked what a particular project would cost, would reply that they thought it was going to cost a given sum, but that they did not want to be considered as being absolutely tied to that sum. They would state that that is their guess. Then, when they are questioned as to why they can not give us something more than a guess, we are told that the definite plans have not been always prepared prior to the submission of the estimate, and that as a result they are simply figuring from similar work elsewhere as to what this particular work will cost. The result of that is to produce what I consider a very bad situation. I believe Congress is entitled to know in advance, within reason, what a project is going to cost before it undertakes the work. We were furnished an illustration of that in the Philippines, where the engineering work touching emplacements on El Frailey, cost over $1,000,000 more than was originally estimated, using the word "estimate" in the way that the engineers now use it—the reason being largely that a detailed plan had not been worked out. It is only fair to say that subsequently the general design was enlarged and more concrete and heavier armor used in that very peculiar fortification. But, I think, the reform here aimed at will be a salutary one. The engineers when they are questioned say, "We did not get so and so from the Artillery," or "We were not sure about certain plans of the ordnance," and always it has been difficult to place the responsibility. Hereafter, before projects are presented, it will be incumbent upon the various corps to get together and perfect their plans, so that they can give us a reasonable estimate.

Take, for instance, the situation at present in regard to San Pedro, which is the defense for Los Angeles. We are just undertaking that work in this particular bill, and we are carrying $100,000 for emplacement work. When I asked Col. Burr what the cost of the emplacement would be for the fortification there he told me in round figures, and said that that was his guess. I said that I hoped it was going to be a more accurate guess than the one we had in the Philippines, and he then stated the reason why he was unwilling to assume the responsibility of tying himself to exact figures.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is no department of the Government where the officers in charge read the language of the law and endeavor to follow it as carefully as they do in the Engineer Department of the War Department. I would like to ask the gentleman just what the language in this bill means. It says:

Estimates shall not be submitted to Congress for appropriations for construction of gun and mortar batteries, modernizing older emplacements, and other construction under the Engineer Department in connection with fortifications and other works of defense.

Does that mean that they can make no estimate for anything in connection with the defense of the Government from the Engineer Department until there have been plans and estimates of cost prepared in advance?

Mr. SHERLEY. The language there follows, or was intended to follow, the exact language of the bill. For instance, the gentleman will find that one of the paragraphs in the bill is for the construction of gun and mortar batteries.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Another one is for modernizing older emplacements, and there is other construction work under the bill. Of course it would only apply to this bill.

Mr. MANN. No; it would not. This is a general provision of law.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not mean to this bill, in a calendar sense, but I mean only to the scope of this bill.

Mr. MANN. I do not think that is correct. You can put a provision in this bill that covers anything, just as we did in the District bill last year. As a matter of fact, would not this language forbid the department from making an estimate for anything in the way of defense of the Government until these plans, specifications, and estimates of cost shall have been prepared? It may be the placing of a fortification in front of a harbor in time of war or something of that sort. The general language in the paragraph seems to cover everything in the way of construction for works of defense.

Mr. SHERLEY. This bill is in connection with fortifications and other works of defense, and we have used the language of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I am not endeavoring to criticize it, but I am simply calling attention to it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand. It may be that there should be an exception in time of war, but certainly in time of peace I know of no reason why they should not. There is one amendment that I propose offering that I think ought to be offered, and that is to strike out the word "specifications," and the reason for that is this:

I am informed that the specifications are rarely drawn up until just when the actual work is about to commence and the specifications are put in the hands of either the officer doing the work or, in the case of a contract, in the hands of the contractor.

Mr. MANN. Now, the gentleman will notice the bill carries an appropriation of $5,000 for the preparation of plans for fortifications. The bill does not carry any appropriation for the preparation of plans in connection with fortifications and other works of defense. It may be we could make an estimate, but suppose we want to put a mine in front of a harbor and it may not be——

Mr. SHERLEY. Except that the Engineer Department has nothing to do with that, I suggest to the gentleman, and it is limited to the Engineer Department. I have no objection, however, to striking out the words "and other works of defense."

Mr. MANN. I think the Engineer Department does have something to do with placing of mines.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MANN. Well, I may be mistaken. It is not carried in this bill, but I think they do have something to do with the placing of mines.

Mr. SHERLEY. The work, so far as I know, is in the hands of the Artillery Corps, and not in the hands of the engineers.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that the words "and other works of defense" should be stricken out?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no objection, but I am quite sure the other provision will be a salutary one. I have no objection to striking out the words the gentleman desires.

Mr. MANN. Then I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I did not withdraw my point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order against the paragraph?

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order and ask why "plans, specifications, and estimates" should not be stricken out?

Mr. SHERLEY. Because if we did that there would be nothing left to the provision.

Mr. FOWLER. What is the matter with the word "cost"? Do you leave the word "cost" in there?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. And that is just it; an estimated cost that is not based on a plan is not worth having. That is our trouble now.

Mr. FOWLER. The trouble with your provision in the bill is you leave the United States without any remedy in time of war.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, I think not.

Mr. FOWLER. There is no doubt about it in my mind.

Mr. SHERLEY. We just differ about that.

Mr. FOWLER. Well, I make the point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. SHERLEY. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to argue the point of order?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For tools, electrical and other supplies, and appliances, to be furnished by the Engineer Department, for the use of the troops for maintaining and operating searchlights and electric light and power plants at seacoast fortifications, $40,000.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In connection with the paragraph which has just gone out on the point of order I want to ask a question. I have read over the gentleman's report on this bill—a very admirable report—in which the gentleman has given on a technical subject detailed information in a way that is ordinarily not given in reports on appropriation bills. It gives the history of the appropriation for the last 25 years, designates the officers under which these sums are disbursed, and in detail the items for which we appropriate. Now, I want to compliment the gentleman for his preparation of the report, because I think that too often gentlemen in charge of technical appropriation bills are too brief in their reports. In reading the report over and devoting a major portion of my attention to a history of recent appropriations I find this item enumerated in the report, namely, $1,043,000, on page 2 of the report, at the bottom of the page, which the report says is a return to the Treasury. Now, does that amount consist of a single item of appropriation returned for some cause, or is it an accumulation of many unexpended items?

Mr. SHERLEY. Without being able to answer with certainty, my impression is that there are quite a number of items which were covered back into the Treasury.

Mr. MURDOCK. Am I correct in this impression that several years ago in this department there accumulated in the Treasury a large sum of money which was available for these various boards?

Mr. SHERLEY. Last year, the gentleman may recall, in the bill we made quite a number of reappropriations. I have only had direct connection with the fortification bill for four or five years. Within that time there have been no very great sums. There have been at times sums running up maybe to $100,000 or more, but my predecessor, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Smith], was very zealous in reappropriating or covering into the Treasury unexpended balances that there was no reason for leaving to the disposal of the department.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman remember whether he succeeded in covering back into the Treasury an amount of money, say, equaling four or five million dollars?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am informed by the clerk of the committee, whose memory runs back very much further than mine, that at one time they did discover a good many millions of dollars, but it was prior to my connection with the bill. Now, as to what happened in that connection I am not exactly clear, but I think it was reappropriated and used for the purposes of defense instead of new appropriations being made.

Mr. MURDOCK. As this department is now conducted and as appropriations are made for it by Congress, there is no such item of segregated funds?

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to assure the gentleman that this appropriation now is practically a current one. While the funds are available until expended, if the gentleman will go through the hearings he will find one of the questions always asked is as to the Treasury balance, the funds allotted and unexpended, and in every instance where we find any undue sum we use that for some other purpose; and where there seems to have been more money appropriated heretofore than was necessary we cut that particular appropriation, because the gentleman will appreciate a good many of these items are maintenance items instead of items for original construction. If there are any large sums loose, as I may say, I am not aware of it.

Mr. MURDOCK. In connection with the report, I see quite a detailed history of the Endicott Board and a supplemental board called the National Defense Board. Now, have the plans which these two boards in the past have outlined for the Nation been generally completed, or are we in the process of completing them as a Nation?

Mr. SHERLEY. The Endicott Board plans were so radically modified by the Taft Board plans, the National Defense Board, that they can practically be disregarded. I can say to the gentleman that, broadly speaking, we have carried out and followed very closely the Taft Board plans, but they are modified from time to time, as they should be, because of the experience gained in matters of armament and seacoast defense. The Taft Board plans in some instances were more elaborate, perhaps, than the needs of the country called for, and there are parts of those projects that will not be carried out. I believe the ultimate defense will cost, in some particulars, considerable less than was estimated in the Taft Board plans.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is his purpose to print the report of this committee on this bill in the RECORD.

Mr. SHERLEY. It had not been my purpose.

Mr. MURDOCK. I hope the gentleman will do it as a model for other committees having appropriation reports to make.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase, manufacture, and test of ammunition for mountain, field, and siege cannon, including the necessary experiments in connection therewith and the machinery necessary for its manufacture at the arsenals, $900,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee what is the necessity of increasing the amount $300,000 above the appropriation in the last bill? Is there any deficiency?

Mr. SHERLEY. In no particular are we so unprepared as in connection with ammunition for the mobile artillery, and the committee therefore felt that we should make a larger appropriation than heretofore so as to endeavor to supply some of the ammunition that we all felt was needed.

Mr. FOWLER. Is that for the purpose of giving the Government greater control over the manufacture of its own ammunition?

Mr. SHERLEY. The size of the appropriation has nothing to do with that one way or another.

Mr. FOWLER. It has not anything to do with that question?

Mr. SHERLEY. No.

Mr. FOWLER. Then what benefit does the Government derive from the increased appropriation?

Mr. SHERLEY. It gets more ammunition.

Mr. FOWLER. Manufactured by the Government?

Mr. SHERLEY. Most of it; but some of it is not.

Mr. FOWLER. Is any of it purchased from the Du Pont Co.?

Mr. SHERLEY. Heretofore we have been purchasing quite a considerable part of our powder from the Du Pont people. I will say to the gentleman that less than 10 per cent of this sum is used for powder whether manufactured by us or purchased.

Mr. FOWLER. What does this go for, then?

Mr. SHERLEY. For the projectiles, shells, caps, and all the other things that go to make ammunition.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there now greater necessity for increasing this appropriation for this purpose than there was in the last bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. Last year we were more liberal than we had been for some time past, and this year we felt that we could appropriate this sum; the committee thought this amount ought to be appropriated.

Mr. FOWLER. Were there any objections in the committee to the appropriation of that sum?

Mr. SHERLEY. The report of the committee was a unanimous report.

Mr. FOWLER. Then I will withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The objection is withdrawn.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. COX. I desire to get some information. For some time I have been somewhat interested in the policy of the Government manufacturing its own ammunition and its own munitions of war, and in connection with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], I think the gentleman in charge of this bill should be complimented for the limitation upon the cost of powder. But that is not the point I wanted to bring out. I wanted to get a little information on a paragraph that has been passed—

For the purchase, manufacture, and test of mountain, field, and siege cannon—

And so forth. About how much of the cannon that is being made for fortification purposes is now being made and manufactured in the Government's own arsenals, if the chairman can give us some information upon that?

Mr. SHERLEY. That depends a good deal upon the character of the matériel. In some instances we are making a very large part; in others we are making very much less. I will say to the gentleman that at present we are using all the arsenals to the utmost of their available capacity. There is now pending before the subcommittee on the sundry civil appropriation bill in the Committee on Appropriations a proposal to expend some $250,000 in alterations at the Rock Island Arsenal, with the idea of their making more of this matériel, inasmuch as the amount of small arms to be manufactured will be very much less in the future than it has been heretofore, the reserve being pretty nearly supplied. As the result of that, if the appropriation should be made, we will in the future manufacture very much more of this matériel than heretofore.

Mr. COX. Now, I am asking information on the armament of the fortifications—the large guns. Does the gentleman mean to say that in the future we will manufacture more large cannon than we have manufactured in the past?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit me, the paragraph that the gentleman refers to has nothing to do with seacoast cannon. It refers to the mobile Artillery. As to the seacoast cannon, we now manufacture our supply entirely.

Mr. COX. I am talking about the armament of fortifications that has been passed over.

Mr. SHERLEY. That was for the purchase, manufacture, and test of mountain, field, and siege cannon.

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, the mountain, field, and siege cannon are not the same kind of armament as seacoast cannon.

Mr. COX. Yes. That is an explanation that I had not heard before. Now, to what extent is this kind of cannon being manufactured in our arsenals?

Mr. SHERLEY. I can not answer that, for the reason I stated a few moments ago, that the cannon are of various caliber, from 3-inch up, and consist not only of the guns but the carriages and limbers and a good many other things in connection with the guns. As to some of them we have been making a larger quantity than others, but we are using to the utmost the capacity of the arsenals as they exist to-day.

Mr. COX. Are we making at our arsenals to-day any 12-inch or 14-inch guns?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; but that has nothing to do with this paragraph at all. That is seacoast cannon. The gentleman can carry the distinction in his mind in this way: The mobile artillery means what the words imply—something that is capable of being moved—and while they have used very much larger siege guns in some instances recently than heretofore, yet they must be movable in order to be mobile, within the meaning of the term "mobile artillery."

Mr. COX. I understand that. Now, will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to this language in the paragraph? I want to see what it means. Leaving out the first part of it, it reads:

Provided, That the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, is hereby authorized to enter into contracts or otherwise incur obligations for the purposes above mentioned not to exceed $300,000, in addition to the appropriations herein and heretofore made.

How are those contracts let—on competitive bidding?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. COX. Let out to various manufacturers?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. I will say to the gentleman that we have had very elaborate testimony touching this whole subject, which he will find in the hearings. In some instances the cost of our manufacture as against the cost of buying from private manufacturers was very much in favor of the Government. However, it is only fair to say that some of the recent contracts approach and in some cases go under the price that it has been costing the Government to manufacture itself. Whether that was due to the agitation by the committee and other Members or not is a question, though probably it is only fair to say that some of it has been due to the fact that the manufacturers, having gotten over the initial cost of making a new article, were enabled to effect economies that warranted them in bidding at a lower figure.

Mr. COX. Is it not fair to say that a large part of this reduction has been caused by the fact that the Government has engaged largely in the manufacture?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no doubt in the world that in some instances we have been charged exorbitant prices for some of the things we have bought, and I want to assure the gentleman that the committee, within the limit of its power, has made searching inquiry and will continue to do so. What has been done in regard to powder should also be done as to a great many articles. What enabled us to work with some degree of accuracy in the powder matter was the fact that we could present known costs to the Government in comparison with the supposed cost to the private manufacturer. The gentleman will appreciate, however, the difficulty of determining cost. For instance we buy a certain quality of steel for the making of our guns. Now, for a committee to determine intelligently just what that steel ought to cost is a problem of no mean magnitude.

Mr. COX. I am satisfied that is true. Now, one further question, if the gentleman will permit me. Is it not the gentleman's observation and conclusion, based upon a thorough and exhaustive investigation, that ever since the Government embarked upon the plan of manufacturing powder or ammunition of any kind, or arms of any kind, from that moment down to the present time the tendency has been for the manufacturers of these same commodities to lower their prices to the Government?

Mr. SHERLEY. I could not say as to what the actual fact has always been, but that would be the natural tendency; and I want to say this to the gentleman: Here is my own idea of what ought to be the policy of the Government touching the manufacture or purchase of material for war purposes. I believe that in large measure it should make the most of such material, and I think the reason is entirely different from that which applies ordinarily to governmental manufacture or purchase.

The defense of the Nation, the life of the Nation, is so important that the Government can well afford to go into manufacture and not be dependent upon outside aid. In addition to that, usually the thing that is needed is something for which there is but one purchaser, the Government itself. Therefore unless it, by manufacture of its own, has some sort of whip over the outside manufacturer, it is liable to be held up in price. I would not be in favor of the Government manufacturing shoes for the soldiers, because shoes are things that are bought and sold in the open market, and concerning which the Government is at no disadvantage any more than any other purchaser; but in the making of things that it peculiarly and exclusively uses, I think it ought to do a large part of the manufacturing. Whether it ought to do all of it or not is a question. For instance, the Government in having some of its powder manufactured outside has had a basis of comparison by which we could determine whether we were efficiently manufactering it ourselves or not. It also had somewhat the advantage of having the inventive genius and skill of others as well as our own officers engaged in the work. It also might provide for an additional supply in case of great need in time of war. But, broadly speaking, I think we ought to manufacture very largely the things that we exclusively need for war purposes.

Mr. COX. Are we manufacturing as much as half our powder now that is used in the Army, or what proportion are we manufacturing?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; the Army and Navy plants together have been manufacturing, I think, about 40 per cent. That is my recollection.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman give the committee any figures as to the per cent of small arms and cannon that the Government is manufacturing?

Mr. SHERLEY. We do not deal with small arms in this bill, and I would not undertake to give the gentleman complete information on that subject.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman give us any information as to the other part of my question?

Mr. SHERLEY. As to seacoast cannon, we are manufacturing all of them. We do not make the steel. We buy the steel, but we actually make the cannon.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman that we manufacture all of our small arms.

Mr. COX. What does the gentleman think of the wisdom, or unwisdom, perhaps—and I am now asking for information, because I know the gentleman is thoroughly familiar with this matter—as to making appropriations large enough for the Government to go in and do this work and make its own material far enough ahead so that it may meet any ordinary emergency that may arise in time of war?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not like to anticipate what my judgment may be touching an item that is before me in the sundry civil bill, but I am inclined to think that we ought with reasonable dispatch to give sufficient capacity to the arsenals to do the great proportion of the work. But the gentleman from Indiana will appreciate that some of the work we are doing now at arsenals will begin to grow rapidly less.

Mr. COX. Will it continue to grow rapidly less in the future?

Mr. SHERLEY. It will, as to that character of work, and that will give us available space for other kind of work. I am not prepared to say that we ought overnight to jump into building arsenals to undertake work. The gentleman from Indiana must understand that we have no monopoly of skill any more than any manufacturer has, and that if we undertake to do new work we will find it expensive, just as a manufacturer does in the first instance. If you undertake to throw us immediately into doing a great deal of new work you will find that there will be a great deal of waste of money.

Mr. COX. I think the gentleman is quite right, but in time does not the gentleman think we ought to do that?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; and I think in time that will be the policy of the Government.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be expended for powder other than small-arms powder at a price in excess of 53 cents a pound.

Mr. HEALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. If I may have the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky, I would like to ask his attention to the preceding paragraph as to the capacity of the arsenal referred to.

Mr. SHERLEY. About 9,000 pounds a day.

Mr. GOOD. Two million seven hundred thousand pounds, or nine thousand pounds a day?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; 9,000 pounds a day, or about 2,700,000 a year.

Mr. HEALD. The question I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky is whether this refers to the theoretical capacity or the actual capacity of these arsenals?

Mr. SHERLEY. It says its full capacity, and I suppose its full capacity means its actual capacity.

Mr. HEALD. Does the gentleman realize that the theoretical capacity of these factories is an entirely different proposition from their actual capacity? It was shown in the hearings last year that in the manufacture of smokeless powder the actual output was but one-third of the theoretical capacity of the plant, and I understood that Admiral Twining, after these hearings, in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, stated that while the final output might be increased to three times the present output, that one part of the process of manufacture, and a necessary part of it, was running 24 hours a day, and, therefore, without increasing any part of the process, it would absolutely be impossible to increase its total output.

Mr. SHERLEY. As I understand it, the Navy is running its plant 24 hours a day and at its full capacity.

Mr. HEALD. Does that apply to every part of the process, or is one part running 24 hours and the other parts only 8 hours?

Mr. SHERLEY. I can not say, but I assume that it is used at its maximum—all of the plant. Whether that implies the lying idle for a few hours of certain parts of the plant I do not know, because that involves a knowledge of powder making that I do not possess. I think the term "full capacity" is one about which there need be no undue confusion of mind.

Mr. HEALD. If I may further suggest, my idea was to bring out this fact: That while it has been stated that these Government powder factories are running on one eight-hour shift, it may be that when we desire to operate these plants for three eight-hour shifts for the purpose of increasing the total output we may find that we are already working them to their full actual capacity. My impression from reading the statements made by Admiral Twining in the hearings before the Naval Committee last year was to the effect that the total output could not be increased without increasing some parts of the plants, and the committee has not provided in any place for their enlargement.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman will realize that the provisions of this bill for the manufacture would carry with it the right to make certain expenditures in connection with the arsenal and in connection with the manufacture.

It may be that some one part of the plant needs to be increased in order to use other parts at their maximum capacity, and I assume that no mathematical accuracy can be had in determining the full capacity of a plant by simply multiplying the output of one shift of eight hours by three, but the actual tests would show full capacity and an approximate idea of full capacity ought not to be difficult.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Delaware has expired.

Mr. HEALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEALD. Mr. Chairman, some years ago, according to my recollection, there was an appropriation made for an increase of these plants, and while that has been done I have not observed that there has been an increase of their capacity. For that reason, I think the committee ought to know whether or not an increase in certain parts of the process of manufacture shall be enlarged so that the maximum efficiency of every part of the plant can be made available. There is one thing certain to my knowledge, and that is the power plants at these plants are largely in excess of the requirements of the other parts, although that is not the one to which I was particularly referring.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I suppose there will not be any need, in order to arrive at an output of one-half of the full capacity, to increase materially any part of the existing plant, and in connection with the Navy plant I find Admiral Twining before our committee made the following statement:

Mr. SHERLEY. Do you actually operate that plant at the maximum of its capacity?

Admiral TWINING. Yes. This represents substantially its maximum capacity. All of the processes that can be advantageously carried on continuously are carried on, except possibly on holidays, for 24 hours a day, while certain processes that can not be efficiently carried on that way because of the overloading of some other part of the plant are carried on 8 or 16 hours per day.

Mr. HEALD. Mr. Chairman, that practically covers the suggestion I was making, that the plant is probably not so balanced that the maximum of product can be secured from each part of the process.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no information as to whether there is absolute accurate adjustment between every part, but as they are making it much under the price that we have been buying it for, it shows, at least, that we have been obtaining an efficiency that may be well commended.

Mr. HEALD. I only thought if we are going to secure the maximum efficiency from these plants that it is desirable that every part of the plant be made efficient.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no doubt they have ample power to do that. Certainly a recommendation made by those in charge would receive careful consideration at our hands.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The adoption of this provision we are now considering and the paragraph we have just passed will result, in my opinion, in economy in the purchase of powder and ammunition. According to the reports, in 1911 there was purchased by the Army and Navy 3,950,000 pounds of powder, not including small-arms powder. There was a total of 4,436,680 pounds of powder purchased. In 1912 we purchased 2,448,000 pounds of powder. This powder was all purchased at a price of 60 cents per pound, except in the small-arms powder, which was purchased at a higher price. If the limitation, which we are placing on this bill, had prevailed in the appropriation bills of 1911 and 1912, we would have saved to the Government in 1911 in the purchase of powder $310,707.60, and in 1912 $151,360.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman is talking about the purchase of powder now.

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And the powder that is manufactured?

Mr. GOOD. No; I will reach that presently.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask in this connection about the powder that the Government manufactures at this plant, where I think the gentleman stated it was only producing one-sixth of its maximum capacity, working one-third of its time.

Mr. GOOD. I did not say that.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the gentleman did, not to-day.

Mr. GOOD. The plant, according to the statement of Gen. Crozier, has a maximum capacity of 9,000 pounds per day, or 2,700,000 pounds per year.

Mr. MADDEN. That is 24 hours per day?

Mr. GOOD. Twenty-four hours per day, and that plant is being worked only to one-sixth of its capacity.

Mr. MADDEN. How many hours a day?

Mr. GOOD. There is no statement made with reference to that. The plant last year produced somewhere between 400,000 and 500,000 pounds of powder.

Mr. MADDEN. The conclusions I reached from the statements which were made were based upon what I believe to be the fact, that eight hours a day was being employed in this particular powder factory and that during the eight hours' work only one-sixth of the maximum output was being produced, so that I was wondering, in estimating the total aggregate possibilities of the plant, whether the estimate was not more than double what the working capacity of the plant is.

Mr. GOOD. I would rather trust the statement of Gen. Crozier in regard to that than my own or any statement of any Member of the House, because I believe he has the detailed knowledge of the facts connected with that subject, which we do not have.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why does not the Government work this Picatinny powder plant more than one-sixth of its capacity? What is the reason for it?

Mr. GOOD. It is on the theory that the Government ought to purchase of private factories a certain amount of powder for the purpose of enabling those factories to furnish powder in time of war.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now the Government can make the powder cheaper than a private concern?

Mr. GOOD. The Government can not make it any cheaper than a private concern. We do not know what it is costing to manufacture powder by a private concern. Col. Buckner was before the committee, and refused to state what it was actually costing the Du Pont factory to manufacture powder. We do know, in the Navy, where we produced 2,500,000 pounds of powder last year, that it cost, exclusive of overhead charges, 30½ cents per pound.

Mr. MURDOCK. Inclusive of overhead charges, how much?

Mr. GOOD. Inclusive of overhead charges, as computed by Admiral Twining, in the Navy, the cost was 40.74 cents per pound.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then this bill fixes a limitation of 53 upon the powder of the private manufacturer?

Mr. GOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. MURDOCK. It would follow from the figures that the gentleman has given that the Government does make powder cheaper than the private manufacturer.

Mr. GOOD. It makes powder cheaper than the private manufacturer sells it, but we do not know what it is costing the private manufacturer to produce powder. Personally I believe that the private manufacturer is manufacturing this powder at not to exceed 25 cents per pound. If gentlemen will turn to the hearings and read the testimony of Admiral Twining, commencing on page 358, wherein he enumerates 10 or 12 different things wherein the Government is handicapped and private manufacturers are not handicapped, all of which add to the increased cost of powder, I think he will realize that this cost of 30½ cents could be materially reduced. In the cost of 40.74 cents is included interest on investment. This charge is 3 cents per pound. We have made two appropriations for the powder factory at Picatinny Arsenal, one of $165,000 and one of $175,000, or $340,000, exclusive of land and officers' quarters. The capacity of that plant is, generally speaking, according to Gen. Crozier's statement, 3,000,000 pounds. If you multiply that by 3 cents a pound, you have $90,000 a year as an interest charge on an investment of $340,000.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then I will ask the gentleman this: Is this payment which we make to the private manufacturer of powder in excess of what it costs the Government to manufacture powder in the nature of a subsidy by this Government to this single powder company to keep it in existence?

Mr. GOOD. Well, I do not know that I would say it is in the nature of a subsidy. I will say it is in the nature of a compromise between those who believe that the Government ought to manufacture all of its powder and those who believe that the private manufacture ought to be kept in operation, so that in time of war we would not find ourselves without powder.

Mr. MURDOCK. That defines, to my mind, a subsidy.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman, personally, I would prefer to see that in matters of this kind——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOWLER and Mr. MADDEN rose.

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. In making the figure of cost 40 cents, including overhead charges, was there anything calculated for the destruction of property, wear and tear, and renewal?

Mr. GOOD. Oh, yes; the depreciation is provided for. I will say to the gentleman that the estimate of depreciation is 10 per cent. The plant at Indian Head has been in operation for 10 years; the plant is practically in as good condition as when it was installed.

Mr. MADDEN. I notice no account is taken of the value of the land on which the plant is constructed.

Mr. GOOD. The estimate of $512,000 is the entire value of the Picatinny Arsenal, which includes not only the cost of the powder factory but also the value of the land and the cost of all officers' quarters that are situated on the land.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman did not state that a moment ago.

Mr. GOOD. But that is the case.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. FOWLER. Does your estimate include loss by reason of the explosion of powder?

Mr. GOOD. The cost of insurance is placed by Admiral Twining in his statement, found on page 293, at 3 cents a pound.

Mr. FOWLER. That is intended to cover loss of that kind?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, I desire to inquire if the last bill did not limit the amount per pound to 71 cents?

Mr. GOOD. You mean a year ago?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; the last bill that was passed through this House.

Mr. GOOD. The Army bill was passed a few days ago, and in that bill we limited the price of small-arms powder to 65 cents, if I recall correctly; but the cost of manufacturing small-arms powder, according to the testimony of all the witnesses, is about 10 cents a pound or more in excess of the cost of ordnance powder.

Mr. FOWLER. In the last fortification bill that was passed did you not limit the amount which might be paid for powder to 71 cents per pound?

Mr. GOOD. To 60 cents for cannon powder.

Mr. FOWLER. And small-arms powder was 71 cents?

Mr. GOOD. Seventy-one or seventy-two.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, can you tell the committee what was paid for small-arms powder prior to this limitation of a year ago?

Mr. GOOD. In 1908 the cost per pound was 84½ cents and 86.7 cents; in 1909 it was 78 cents; in 1910 it was 75 cents. It has been 75 cents ever since that time until 1912.

Mr. FOWLER. Have there been any changes made affecting the economics of the manufacture of powder during this time which would lower the price materially?

Mr. GOOD. No doubt there have been some changes. The report of Gen. Crozier shows a saving of 3 cents a pound in the Army, and the report of Admiral Twining shows a saving of 2 cents and a fraction in the Navy.

Mr. FOWLER. Does not that show the enormous profits which the powder companies have been receiving from the United States prior to the efforts of this committee to limit the price to be paid?

Mr. GOOD. I have no doubt but that the private manufacturers have made enormous profits.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOWLER. Do you not think the committee has done the country a great work by investigating the price of powder and undertaking to limit the amount which should be paid to other companies than that of the company manufacturing powder by United States authority?

Mr. GOOD. I think it has, and I think the probability is that we will make appropriation for increasing our present plants, and will discontinue the practice of furnishing to the Du Pont Powder Co. or any other powder company that private and secret information, and those discoveries that our officers in the Army and Navy have made in the betterment of these explosives, and turning them over to a private concern, which in turn manufactures powder and sells it to the different nations of the world.

Mr. CANNON. Why should we not, if the gentleman will allow me?

Mr. HEALD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will yield, first, to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Why should we discourage our own people, unless the Government goes into commerce in competition with the other nations of the world? Why should we follow a policy that would discourage our own people from adding to production that involves labor and contributes to the commerce of the world?

Mr. GOOD. I think that as a general principle we should not; but when it comes to powder, when it comes to any article that is used in warfare, it seems to me that after we have expended a great deal of money in educating officers in the Army and Navy to perfect a given device, that device should not be turned over to the very power with which we might come in actual contact.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague from Iowa be given a minute more.

Mr. CANNON. The answer is plausible and possibly satisfactory. I am not criticizing the gentleman. I am asking the question from another standpoint.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] asks unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. GOOD] be allowed to proceed for one minute more. Is there objection?

There is no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is it not a fact that all the other countries in the world keep the art and the special chemical formulæ for the making of explosives that they use in this ordnance powder secret, from the fact that it is controlled by their own subsidies?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know as to that. I know that France manufactures her own powder; not only her military powder, but she has a monopoly upon all powder. It is the purpose of the officers of the Army and Navy to keep our formulæ secret, but after submitting those formulæ to the powder manufacturers, the same manufacturers are now, according to the testimony of their officers, going to the different countries of the world soliciting trade. Of course, they could furnish to other nations the same powder that they are furnishing to us, made under the formulæ that are submitted by our Army and Navy officials.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And that constitutes the objection against imparting these formulæ?

Mr. GOOD. I think so.

Mr. HEALD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. HEALD. The gentleman suggests that the formulæ and the art of making powders and their development have been in the hands of Army and Navy officers, and have been turned over to private manufacturers of powder. Surely the gentleman does not mean that as a statement of fact.

Mr. GOOD. I mean to say that the first smokeless powder that was manufactured in this country was manufactured by an officer in the Navy under a formula that he himself had perfected, and, if I do not mistake the hearings, that formula was afterwards sold to the Du Pont Powder Works. I do not want to detract from the very efficient service that the Du Pont Powder Co. has rendered to the country in helping to perfect that formula and to produce a better grade of powder than this officer in the Navy had originally formulated.

Mr. HEALD. Will the gentleman give me a minute of time?

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman can get it. Now, Mr. Chairman, this provision will, in addition, provide for the manufacture by the Government of a million pounds of powder more than it manufactured last year. While we do not know exactly what it is costing the private manufacturer to manufacture powder, we do know that, exclusive of overhead charges, it is costing the Government only about 30 cents a pound to manufacture it. These overhead charges will go on whether the arsenal at Picatinny manufactures 400,000 pounds of powder or manufactures 1,400,000 pounds, as it will under the provisions of this bill. Therefore it is safe to say that the million pounds of powder that it will manufacture this year in excess of what it manufactured last year will cost the Government only 30 cents per pound, or it will result in a net saving of almost $300,000 to the Government; and the limit that we have placed on the price of powder will do no injury to the private manufacturer. It is still large enough to give the manufacturer an ample profit on his investment. While I think the price is still too large, I hope that these provisions placed in the bill with regard to powder will prevail and be adopted by the committee.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. With reference to—

The operation of said powder factory to not less than one-half of the full capacity thereof.

If this powder factory should be operated one-half the days of the year to its full capacity, 24 hours a day, or for the entire year 12 hours a day at its full capacity, would not that comply with the provision contained in these words?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know.

Mr. MANN. Is it not patent on its face that it would? You are now putting up a construction of these words to officers of the United States, and I think they are entitled to have some opinion from the debate in Congress when the provision is being considered.

Mr. GOOD. This provision provides that the powder factory at Picatinny shall produce one-half of its maximum capacity——

Mr. MANN. Of its full capacity.

Mr. GOOD. Of its full capacity. Now, the matter is left entirely with the officer in charge of that factory whether he shall operate it under two shifts part of the time, part of the time under one shift, or part of the time under three shifts, and let it remain idle part of the time. Gen. Crozier says the maximum capacity is practically 3,000,000 pounds per year, and we say by this provision the Ordnance Department of the Army shall conduct that factory at one-half of its maximum capacity.

Mr. MANN. What he says about the maximum capacity may be one thing, but the question is, How much powder can they manufacture? That is getting down to brass tacks, as we say. If they run the factory at full capacity for one-half of the year, assuming that the seasons do not make any difference, would not that comply with the provisions of the bill?

Mr. GOOD. I think it would if they produced one-half of the full capacity of the plant.

Mr. MANN. Supposing they ran the plant the entire year, 24 hours a day, would that be obtaining the full capacity of the plant, regardless of what somebody said it ought to produce?

Mr. GOOD. If it produces 9,000 pounds for each day in the year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HEALD. If I can have two minutes of that time I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HEALD. Mr. Chairman, I can not, in fairness, let the gentleman's statement go as to the development of smokeless powder. As a matter of fact, the history of it has been recited on this floor many times, and it is to the effect that the Army and Navy officers did develop, in theory, a smokeless powder, and then called together the manufacturers of this country and laid before them the theory of its manufacture and asked them to bring about its commercial development. The commercial development of the manufacture of smokeless powder has never been at the hands of the Army or Navy. It has been wholly and entirely in the hands of private manufacturers. When the Government started to make it commercially, it was with the assistance of the experts from these companies, who gave to the Government all of their processes, and not the Government giving to the private manufacturers their discoveries or their improved processes. And further, the secret of the manufacture of these powders is not one that is kept from any manufacturer. There is no secret about it.

The manufacture of gunpowder in France is exclusively a Government monopoly, and in the light of the history of explosions of magazines on French vessels, I think there is reason to believe that this country has certainly a higher grade of powder than that which is produced by the French Government monopoly.

I for one do not believe in this Government exclusively manufacturing its own powder. The fact has been referred to on this floor that private manufacturers of smokeless powder in this country are beginning to sell their product to the governments of foreign countries. That may be deprecated. It has been. The question is asked, Why should the powder manufacturers of this country sell powder to foreign countries with whom we might engage in war? There is no difference between selling them powder than manufacturing for them the battleships which we are glad to build in our shipyards, and we never miss an opportunity to secure contracts for them. I believe that the sale of powder to foreign countries has been made with the concurrence and the consent of this Government and with the assistance of the War Department and the Navy Department and the State Department. It would not be rash to assume that this condition has been brought about so that these private factories may be held intact as a reserve for this country in time of war. That policy is one which Congress seems determined to destroy, and, in my opinion, if it abolishes it the result will be the same condition of Government monopoly that exists in France to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Delaware has expired.

Mr. GOOD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more in order that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the testimony of Admiral Twining, at the bottom of page 308 of the hearings, wherein he gives a history of the development of smokeless powder in this country, and he says:

The earliest knowledge I have in regard to smokeless powder of the type we are now using is that it was discovered by a French chemist named Vielle about 1882. The French Government began to use it in 1887 in small sizes, a powder which might be said to be in general the same as we are using to-day, although some minor differences or changes have been made in the manufacture. However, it was made according to much the same smokeless-powder formula that we use to-day. About 1893 the same kind of powder was used in Russia, and they probably discovered the secret in France. In 1896 one of our chemist in the service of the Navy, named Patterson, who is now the chemist in charge of the powder factory, discovered a method of producing soluble nitrocellulose of 12.5 nitration, which was higher than had been thought possible before. In 1897 the Navy began the manufacture of smokeless powder at Newport, R. I., and manufactured about 1,000 pounds that year. I believe that some of that powder is still in existence and that it is good powder yet. Lieut. Bernadou and Capt. Converse, two naval officers, who had been prominently identified with ordnance matters, made a very extensive study of smokeless powder and took out certain patents. I believe that these patents are not valid to-day, and I do not think that any royalty has been paid in consequence of them.

Mr. HEALD. I suggest to the gentleman that the production of 1,000 pounds of powder in one year, or about 3 pounds per day, is not a commercial manufacture, and I think his reference supports what I have just said, that the theory of it had been worked by the officers of the service; but the department had brought together the commercial manufacturers of powder and asked them to make it a commercial success. They did make it a commercial success, and when this Government started to manufacture on a commercial basis these same manufacturers furnished freely, without expense to the Government, plans for processes and machinery. The Government did not supply the private manufacturers.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the alteration of 3.2-inch batteries to rapid-fire field batteries, including sights, implements, equipments, and the materials and machinery necessary for alteration and manufacture at the arsenals, $175,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so for the purpose of asking the chairman why the appropriation in this paragraph is increased $100,000 above the appropriation in the last bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. There are quite a number of old 3.2-inch batteries which can be converted into modern 3-inch batteries at a cost very much less than it would require to create new batteries. As I stated a while ago, we are very far behind what we need in matériel for mobile artillery, and this is the cheapest way to get that matériel.

Mr. FOWLER. Are these rapid-fire guns worn out?

Mr. SHERLEY. No; but when made there was no successful method of recoil, and the rapid fire was much less than in the modern gun. It is now practically an antiquated gun. The development has been so rapid in connection with these guns that the 3.2-inch gun is now antiquated.

Mr. FOWLER. How many of these guns will be repaired?

Mr. SHERLEY. Four batteries.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman think it will take $100,000 to make the necessary changes?

Mr. SHERLEY. It was estimated that for the conversion of seven 3.2-inch batteries into 3-inch batteries it would take $250,000, and that was the amount of money asked. We have given $175,000, which, with the available balance, would make the conversion of the four batteries.

Mr. FOWLER. What would it cost to complete these batteries new? Has the gentleman any estimate on that?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; I have not it at hand, but I think it would cost $77,000 for a battery.

Mr. FOWLER. For the new battery or the converted one?

Mr. SHERLEY. For the new one, and about half as much to convert it.

Mr. FOWLER. Would the converted one be as good as the new one?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. And would save just so much to the country?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. HOBSON. I want to ask the gentleman as to whether the new tube they put in is necessitated through rapid erosion or whether the gentleman has any statement as to the cost of the change in caliber? I can understand about the uniformity of equipment.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think the change of caliber is due to any tendency toward erosion of the old gun any more than the new. It is simply that the 3.2-inch gun is considered to be of a caliber that has become practically obsolete, and they are making these to correspond, to be uniform with other 3-inch guns, ammunition for which would be useful for all, both the newly made and the converted type.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I can understand the advantage of uniformity of ammunition, but with large batteries like these are you would have uniform ammunition anyway, I would say to the gentleman that I do not want to ask for information that was not given by the technical officers, but the question of the life of the guns, particularly in the Navy, is a mooted question, and is being carefully investigated, and I was wondering whether the change of this caliber to a smaller caliber, which would be done evidently by simply the introduction of a tube with its own rifling, has been necessitated largely by the fact that the old type that is there has suffered rapidly from erosion.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think not. I think a lot of these were not used enough to suffer at all, but a material change having to be made to modernize them in other ways, in the way of carriage and recoil, they also modernize them to the extent of making them uniform with the standard 3-inch guns.

Mr. HOBSON. And also whether the gentleman had before his committee the question of the length of the life of the Coast Artillery guns?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, yes; from time to time we have had testimony touching that, and the desirability of using larger caliber guns with less charge of powder, as against a smaller caliber with a greater charge. In other words, getting the same impact force by an increase in the size of the projectile rather than by an increase of the speed of the projectile.

Mr. HOBSON. Have they any information within the last year or two, recent information, throwing light on that question before the gentleman's committee?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think there has been any particular testimony. There does not seem to be much difference of opinion.

The Clerk read as follows:

ENGINEER DAPARTMENT.

For construction of seacoast batteries, as follows:
In the Hawaiian Islands, $70,000;
In the Philippine Islands, $700,000;
In all, $770,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. I desire to ask the chairman whether there have been appropriations for this same purpose of constructing seacoast batteries in the Hawaiian Islands heretofore; and if so, about how long has that been going on?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, that work has been going on for a number of years. There have been expended there large sums heretofore.

Mr. FOWLER. They expended $170,000 there in the last appropriation.

Mr. SHERLEY. We have expended $2,980,000 and odd heretofore at Honolulu and Pearl Habor in connection with the fortifications there.

Mr. FOWLER. I see you cut the appropriation $100,000 this time below the appropriation of a year ago. Was that because of the fact that the appropriations which had already been made were sufficient to warrant the cutting off of that amount?

Mr. SHERLEY. A year ago they asked for $222,200, which it was estimated was sufficient to complete the work to be done there. We gave them $170,000, which should have left a difference of $52,200, as being the amount needed to entirely finish the work; but the estimate of the year before was based on an error of some thousands of dollars, the result being that there is now needed $70,000 to complete the emplacement work at the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. FOWLER. Will this complete the seacoast-battery defense there, or will there be a requirement hereafter for additional appropriations for that purpose?

Mr. SHERLEY. There will be certain details that may have to be supplied, but, broadly speaking, the items carried in this bill, of which this is one, are sufficient to complete the entire project for the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. FOWLER. In the Philippine Islands I discover that you are able to cut the appropriation there $100,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, we have cut the appropriation very much more than that. They are asking this year, in this one item, $1,000,000, and we are appropriating $700,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Last year your amount appropriated was $800,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. The amounts of appropriations are determined by the amount of money that can be expended during the period which the bill is supposed to cover. There are certain projects for the Hawaiian Islands and the Philippine Islands. The work is being prosecuted as rapidly as possible, and we ascertained at the hearings how much will be needed to continue that work until moneys from another bill will be available.

Mr. FOWLER. Will this $700,000 complete the project, or is it intended simply to provide for what is necessary until the next bill is prepared?

Mr. SHERLEY. It is to provide what is necessary until the next bill.

Mr. FOWLER. And what is the estimate for the completion of the items now under way?

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, under this item as of July 1, 1912, there was needed $1,000,000 for the construction of emplacements. We are carrying here $700,000, and, speaking generally,

I would say about $300,000 more money will be needed for the emplacement work there.

Mr. FOWLER. Unless we give the Philippine Islands their independence we will continue to appropriate something like that annually, will we?

Mr. SHERLEY. At the end of another appropriation of approximately $300,000 the amount of money necessary for emplacement work will be completed. Now, what the gentleman perhaps desires to know is the amount of money, in round figures, that is necessary to complete the project for the Philippine Islands, and as to that I have to say as of July 1, 1912, not having made the subtraction of the amount carried in this bill, there was needed for Manila Bay about $1,163,000, which, of course, does not include the proportionate part of the moneys necessary to be expended for ammunition and submarine mines, which perhaps could not be segregated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I simply desire half a minute to ask a question of the gentleman from Kentucky. We have a naval station in Cuba at Guantanamo, but no fortifications there, I understand?

Mr. SHERLEY. No.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There is no appropriation, I observe, in the bill for any fortifications there?

Mr. SHERLEY. And none asked.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is just what I wanted to inquire.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is a project for Guantanamo which involves an expenditure of about $2,240,000, but so far there has not been presented to the committee any estimate for fortifications at that place.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I simply wanted to inquire whether the committee deemed it inadvisable or whether it was because of no recommendation.

Mr. SHERLEY. I might say to the gentleman and for the further benefit of the committee that as of date July 1, 1912, having in mind either the beginning and completion of fortifications or the completion of those already commenced at San Juan, Guantanamo, Honolulu, Pearl Harbor, Guam, Manila Bay, Subig Bay, and Kiska Island, there will be needed appropriations totaling eleven million one hundred and thirty-seven thousand and some odd dollars. That includes moneys for seacoast reserve ammunition, submarine mines, and carries all the items like emplacement, electric installation, searchlights, fire control, submarine mine structures, etc.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That fully answers the subject of my inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For installation and replacement of electric light and power plants at the defenses of the following localities:
In the Hawaiian Islands, $34,469.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the pro forma amendment, and I hope I will not be considered hypercritical in a suggestion which I am about to make. These provisions of the bill are carried under the head in large capital letters, "Fortifications in insular possessions." The term "insular possessions" grew up from the War with Spain to describe certain territory which we had acquired apart from continental United States; but Hawaii is no longer an insular possession; it is a part of the United States, and really ought not to be described as an insular possession. It is true it is an island, but it is not a possession. It is a part of the United States. There is quite a distinction between Hawaii, a Territory, and Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands and the island of Guam. They are possessions. I did not know whether it is practical in the next fortifications bill to either leave out the heading "Fortifications in insular possessions" or segregate the Hawaiian items under the head of "Territory of Hawaii."

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think it may be perfectly proper in another bill to let the heading show "Fortifications in insular possessions and the Hawaiian Islands." The idea that actuated the committee, and which I think was a proper one, was to be enabled to give just some such information as I have tried to give a few minutes ago touching the moneys we are spending outside of continental United States.

Mr. MANN. I understand; but why not change that heading and make it correct?

Mr. SHERLEY. I see no reason why, but I am inclined to believe we will have practically cleaned up the Hawaiian Islands in this bill. We may have an occasional item next year.

Mr. MANN. I care nothing about it; but, of course, Hawaii stands on a different footing from all the rest of this territory now, because we have incorporated it into the Union and made it a Territory of the Union.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think the gentleman's suggestion is a proper one, and next year I think it should be carried out.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill (H. R. 28186) to the House with the recommendation that the same do pass.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. GARRETT having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 28186) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE LATE SENATOR TAYLOR.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to submit the order which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee submits an order which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Sunday, February 23, 1913, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. ROBERT L. TAYLOR, late a Senator from the State of Tennessee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the order.

The question was taken, and the order was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 28499) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, and pending action upon that motion I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] if we can agree upon the length of time to be consumed in general debate on the bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I will say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] that I have no applications for time. I am perfectly willing to go into the reading of the bill at once.

Mr. BURLESON. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that I have one request for time. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] has asked me for 30 minutes, and with the permission of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] I suggest we allow the debate to run on and be limited to one hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and in that connection asks unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to 1 hour, 45 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] and 15 minutes by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR]. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent?

There was no objection.

The motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—KINNEY AGAINST DYER.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may present a report from the Committee on Elections No. 2, and ask for its immediate consideration. (H. Res. 801, H. Rept. 1422.)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPORT.

The Committee on Elections No. 2 has had under consideration the contested-election case of Thomas E. Kinney v. Hon. L. C. Dyer, from the twelfth district of Missouri, and begs leave to report as follows:
The allegations of fraud and intimidation made by contestant were not sustained by the evidence adduced.

Therefore we beg to submit the following resolution for adoption:
Resolved, That Hon. L. C. Dyer is entitled to his seat as a Representative of the twelfth congressional district of Missouri.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON]?

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire if this is a unanimous report?

Mr. NELSON. It is a unanimous report from the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] prevails. The House will resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 28499, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with Mr. RODDENBERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill as follows:

A bill (H. R. 28499) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that by order of the House general debate is to be limited to 1 hour, 45 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], and 15 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. BURLESON. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, in the time allotted to me I desire to discuss the business and political interests of the American people in the Asiatic continent; and by so doing, invite the attention of the House and country to some problems that may well engross the public mind.

There are broad ethnological facts and social principles, elementary in the very existence of races and color, that ultimately shape the whole trend of national and race life. We can not change them; they have been recognized in all history, and will continue to remain fixed. All we can do, and what we should do, is to observe these well-intrenched facts and principles of race and color, and shape our destinies within the rules.

I pause here to pay a tribute, well deserved, to those wards of ours in the far-off Pacific—the inhabitants of the Philippines, of whom I shall have some things to say—our brown man of the Orient, whose ancestors for more than three centuries were more or less under Spanish dominion; who never ceased to struggle against both foreign and domestic oppression. At some time or other during this long period, laying in the pathway of the world's travel, they have been the prey of great nations of western Europe and eastern Asia. Plundered, robbed, and exploited, the products of their toil stolen by aliens, they have at last broken away from a dominant and blighting despotism, and seem to be coming into their own.

The venality of the conqueror sums up all the crimes of successful conquest. There is a mysterious element in human life that demands equality and resists crushing domination in the application of every system of government or economics, whether it be a highly developed system or not. Wherever development is greatest, there will the advocate of the former and the enemy of the latter be greatest. It is a law of progress that where climatic conditions and fertility of soil contribute most to the quick accumulation of wealth, there will civilization alike quicken and advance.

Representative government is the only sure guaranty of any character that personal liberty and personal rights will be protected. The wholesale intrusion of the individual into the political structure of a State government is an American idea of the construction of civil institutions. A strong centralization of power, either in the hands of an usurper or in the government itself, can not exist with our theory of popular government. A powerful executive, invading the constitutional rights and prerogatives of a coordinate branch of representative government and assuming to discharge its functions with a strong hand, can not exist in a true democracy. That the doctrine of the right to control a different people than that participating directly in the government, either by conquest or purchase, implies a government by force of arms can not be disputed, and that it is an European and not an American doctrine is also true. There never has been a conquest of territory except by force of arms, and that conquest rarely maintained except by a resident force of arms in the subjugated territory. Territorial conquests on this continent have ceased. The races of the world seem now to be fixed and settled; and just as each nation holds in high veneration its history, its policies, its life and liberty, so will the happiness of the nation thus committed to high ideals be secure. Rivers and mountain chains will not in the future constitute national boundary lines; it will be the blood that flows in the veins that will fix the habitation.

Some facts with reference to races and governments are as well settled as any principle in mathematics. Europe will never be overrun with the blacks of southern Asia, nor will the brown man or the yellow man burden the soil of this Republic, either as a citizen or as a subjugator of our personal liberties. The entire trend of thought has turned away from that of colonization and conquest to that of methods of government in which are vested and recognized the rights of the citizens composing the government. The civilization of the twentieth century is a thousand years distant in national and race tendencies from the days of Napoleon and George the Third.

There never was a time when the "national home" acquired such proportions of interest in the movement of affairs as it does to-day. Not only is this statement applicable to nations, but more so to races. Not only have they fixed their "dwelling grounds" but the great nations and distinctive races have, apparently, forecasted their future locations and boundaries for long periods of time. We, ourselves, have declared that this hemisphere shall be the home of the Aryan races—the home of the white man. We early declared it our purpose to dedicate this continent not only to the white race, but to that larger personal liberty that we espouse. On December 2, 1823, we announced that—

We owed it to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those foreign powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonial dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments that have declared their independence we have on great consideration and just principles acknowledged we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any way their destiny by any European power in any other light than as a manifestation of an unfriendly disposition against the United States. * * * It is impossible that the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness, nor can anyone believe that our southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition with indifference.

In that declaration we builded better than we realized. We made it, as we supposed, for our own protection, but we made it in fact for the whole white race. We defined not only the limits of government, but the character of the government and the limits of color in national function that should inhabit this continent. The individual man has lost his personality in these world movements in races. Hereafter nations and races will be the unit of consideration and not the individual. One of the conditions that marks the difference between the white man and the colored races is that the white man has established a different plane of living, comporting with his different state of civilization than the colored races. He refuses to be content with clothing, food, and tendencies of those races; hence, the tendency to crowd the markets of the white man to sell his labor and the increasing force thereby adding to the antipathy of race prejudice, demanding of the constituted powers that those races with competing labor be eliminated from contact and competition, and that we maintain our standard of living and of race purity. So fixed and powerful is race prejudice that wherever inferior races appear to be gaining the ascendancy, the white man invokes the criminal statute to protect himself. In California the marriage of a white man or woman to a Mongolian or a negro constitutes a felony. I believe as much in the natural habitat of race distinction as I do in the distinguishing habits of the races themselves.

Through some unaccountable source we exercise control over and possession of the Philippine Islands, with more than 7,000,000 millions of people, two times as many as we had when we denounced England for our own subjugation—lands wholly populated by a race different from ours and more than 7,000 miles away, differing in religion and history, in color and civilization, having nothing in common with us except the desire to manage their own affairs and govern themselves as we do ourselves. We have nothing in common with the Filipinos and never can have, because of race differences that are insurmountable. Projected into the character of the Filipino, that has become a constituent part of his nature and that of all Asiatic races through centuries of heredity, are differences of religion, civilization, and fundamentals in morals and government. These people are opposed to us in every essential of life, character, and personality; yield to us a suspicious obedience, view us with an increasing aversion, while we proclaim to them and to the world our belief in the essential principles of personal liberty. No great publicist has ever put our claim to subjugate the inhabitants of that archipelago upon any other basis than that of conquest, or that we are the trustee of a "manifest destiny."

Development of social life and government has a uniform basis. Mutual dependence is everywhere forced upon all classes. All have the same aspirations, the same intellectual aptitude, the same inclinations—the only difference is in degree—and all are the product of natural evolution. I may not hesitate to say that this national mobilization—this consolidation—of races, all arising out of a law of necessity and a desire not only for lighter burdens of government, but for no government at all by alien races, have introduced into world politics, in acute form, new and far-reaching problems.

These problems are not those to come at some future time; they are here now. The fast-breeding nations of India, China, northern Africa, and Japan, some of whom are now dominated by a handful of Europeans—these hundreds of millions, moved by the new spirit of this age, adjusting themselves with white men through the rising tide of commerce, with a mighty and successful struggle will throw off this restriction by foreign power and establish, I care not how crude it may be, a representative system of government by and for themselves. Let me amplify what I mean by very recent history of Japan. Half a century ago her commerce and taxes were controlled by a foreign power. She had no foreign relations, no navy, but a small army, and she stood in mortal fear of being swallowed up by China. In less than 25 years she has become an independent sovereign nation, whipped China, sliced off Korea and Formosa, and ranked herself as the seventh naval power in the world. She engaged in war with one of the most formidable Governments on earth, hurled her navy against the great war vessels of the Russians, sunk them like broken reeds, and sent 24,000 prisoners to Tokyo. She did more than that. She brought Russia to her knees in arbitration and divided Manchuria to herself, and then formed a defensive alliance with England, the greatest naval power in history. Do such great movements, that shifts power from continent to continent, mean nothing to us?

But the sun had hardly gone down on these achievements by Japan before the common people of China, restive under the dying embers of the Manchu dynasty, in one supreme effort established a national representative government, on which work we have officially, as a Nation, congratulated them, so that now two of the most powerful nations of eastern Asia, with more than four hundred millions of people, are competing with each other for the balance of power and for the liberation of the brown and yellow races. Who in this Chamber may not well assume that these marvelous transformations now proceeding, either China or Japan—probably Japan—may not for her protection attempt to guarantee like protection to all who may join her in the new régime? May we not soon hear the cry of "Asia for Asiatics," as we heard a century ago the cry of "America for Americans"? Japan, more than any other eastern power, has assimilated and improved upon many of our ideas, especially where mechanical skill is required. By her successes with Russia she put herself into the class of world powers with her sixty millions of people and turned into their highway on her march to her future destiny.

I yield to no man in unswerving loyalty to the scope of the Monroe doctrine, to which I have already invited your attention. It is as fixed and irrevocable as any tenet of our institutions, and the world recognizes that fact and our right to enforce it as one not subject to any national convention, review, or decision by any organized body.

I do not share, Mr. Speaker, in the jingo spirit manifested by certain statesmen relative to the occupancy of territory on this continent by the Japanese, either in Hawaii or in Magdalena Bay. Such hysteria, that periodically inflames the public mind, is as baseless as a dream. What possible excuse could Japan have to invade the Western Hemisphere, 6,000 miles from home, without a coaling or supply station? Does she need territory or commercial advantages? Suppose she desired to enter upon an era of conquest and attempted subjugation, what would it profit her? She has scattered lands and islands, from Manchuria on the north to Australia on the south, out of which to make empires and into which to spill her surplus population and build these dependencies out of her own or kindred races in her own zone and at her door. Is it possible that that strong commercial instinct that has marked the whole history of the Japanese might seize her? Why should she look westward for trade? We only take 9 per cent of her foreign trade and send her but 5 per cent, and that when she has within easy reach three-fifths of the population of the globe. What part are we to play, if any, in this marvelous transformation of races in the Eastern Hemisphere?

We have no announced future policy in the Philippines. The time is ripe in these evolutions to inquire, not only for our own safety but in justice to the residents of the Philippines, what our purpose is. One great political party, so long in power, refuses to answer the call of the brown man when he asks of this enlightened Christian Nation what the destinies of himself and his children are to be in his own land, now held from him by a strong, powerful Government. Have we strayed from our long-established national doctrine? Let me quote one sentence from John Stuart Mill:

> The government of a people by itself has a meaning and a reality, but such a thing as a government of one people by another does not and can not exist.

Around that principle have clustered all the race problems and political problems of government. We intrenched ourselves upon this same rock in our declaration:

> All men are created free and equal, and are endowed with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

On that theory are constructed al the States of this federation, and in it rests all our ambitions in the common struggle, with a common hope to a common destiny. Nearly a century after that proclamation, standing upon a field where was waged the mightiest conflict that ever convulsed the human race, where was sealed forever on this continent the covenant of human freedom, the immortal Lincoln said:

> Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new Nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

And concluded that memorable address with the words:

> And that a government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth.

That declaration and what it stands for is as precious to us as the "altars of our religious faith." Have we strayed from our long-established national belief and practice? And are we ready to abandon in our relations with the Filipino the most solemn compact for the preservation of personal and popular liberty ever sealed by the force of arms or by the holy influence of peace? Are we to ape Great Britain, that marvelous sea power that within a century, by the virile hand of the Crown, "swung the pendulum" of British interests across a hemisphere into India, Australia, and Africa, and made the far-away Pacific the scene of her future battle grounds and conquests? Are we to go, too, at our election or be forced to go into these distant waters to enforce a wrong against a people who of right ought to be as free as we are, and would be but for us? We may crush and smother, in our attitude with the Philippines, the principles of personal liberty and representation temporarily that we have so successfully and so justly taught the world was supreme in the government of men, but if we do it will reincarnate itself again to our humiliation. The Boston Herald correctly states the position:

> The important thing for America to decide is not whether the retention of the Philippines will pay, whether it benefits them, or whether it ministers to our national pride, but whether it is right, for on no other foundation can any great national policy securely rest.

The hysteria of imperialism and territorial expansion in the Far East or anywhere else is dead beyond a resurrection. The problem now is not where we can get more territory and more alien races, but how can we honorably get rid of what we now have. There are only two possible courses for the Republic in its conduct with the Philippines—either statehood, to which every act of our occupation for 14 years has pointed, or the recognition of their independence properly safeguarded. Statehood is an unthinkable proposition—to put into the hands of an alien race, consisting of 7,000,000 people, the possibility of the balance of power for 100,000,000 American citizens, and thereby jeopardize our rights and liberties; to make possible a vote in the Philippines on a popular election by them to decide our entire domestic and foreign policy would be to invite the most astounding consequences imaginable. We forget that the fundamental principle in good government consists in assimilating the people as a unit on political institutions. On the administration of the Government of course another principle obtains. Not only must we be a unit as to our political institutions, but on national character and society. The value of the Government to the individual consists in conceding political supremacy, in the recognition of political authority, and in assisting to maintain that authority established upon a strong constitutional basis as the organic law of the land to be unflinchingly adhered to until regularly changed. National character must have the very highest possible standard of right and justice, and society must contribute to a progressive civilization.

Let me observe, then, in connection with that statement, that if there is one well-established fact in history it is that color prejudice is fixed, and no creed, no form of government, will bind races radically different into a harmonious, homogenous whole. Some irrevocable law of the mind has fixed the prejudices of race and color as insurmountable barriers. Let me quote from Campbell's "Twentieth Century in Siam," "Nature has set up physical barriers that are not for man to break down, and Asia will always be Asiatic." I do not agree with my friend from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] that these prejudices are "because of color," as he asserts. Color can not account for failure in natural development and incapacity in some instances for self-government. Climatic conditions, environment, and inherited incapacity for a thousand generations distinguishes them in "creation's divine event." The brown man, the yellow man, and the black man, on the one hand, and the white man, on the other, have been separated always from each other by lines they never passed, and that independent of themselves. No more marked illustration of that fact exists than the association of the Spaniards with the Filipinos for 300 years. After that long period the races emerged from that contact practically free from the blood of each other, the Filipinos being more than 99 per cent pure in race and color. England has been in India for 150 years and administering a government over 300,000,000 of black men, and the gulf socially between them is wider and deeper than ever, and if England did not recognize this antagonism to exist, and that the time is coming when she will need Japan to protect her interests in India, why the alliance that now maintains? Antagonism of color and races will not permit an American or Europeans to be merged with an Asiatic. The chasm exists everywhere and is without fathom. I believe that those distinctions are as lasting as the races themselves, and no temporary government, no creed, no trade will eradicate it; hence the impossibility of unifying the brown man of the Philippines with the Anglo-Saxon of this Republic in our institutions, our morals, and in our civilization.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. CLINE. I will yield for a question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the gentleman is right in his theory, why wait for a period of eight years or six months to get rid of the Philippines?

Mr. CLINE. I will develop that proposition when I get a little further on.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Another question: Why may not people of different races or different nationalities live together under the same government, either a nation made up of a continent or a nation made up of a continent and outside islands?

Mr. CLINE. I have stated as clearly as I could my position on that question, but I will say to the gentleman from Kansas it is because of the inherited tendencies that lie in the very nature of the races that are antagonistic to the white man or the European.

Mr. COX. Put there by God, who created them.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We are living here in the United States, some 90,000,000 of us, many nationalities and different races, living apparently in harmony and having a very good Government.

Mr. CLINE. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the great melting pot of American civilization, I know, has unified the races that have come to this country and made them a harmonious and consistent unit, but the representation who came were from the white nations of Europe, and not from the Asiatics. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. We have some millions of Africans in this country, living under the same Government with us. Why may we not have living with us some Asiatics, protected by the same flag?

Mr. CLINE. Does the gentleman presume that the citizenship of this Republic, demonstrating as it has its ability to successfully organize and maintain the greatest representative government that ever existed, will ever consent that the Negro, who was a "Helot in the day of Abraham" and will be a thousand years hence, because of the fixed limitation that his Maker has written into his being, who has not in the whole history of his race a philosopy, a science, a discovery, a religion, or a government to his credit, be permitted ever to assume the control or management of the government of the Anglo-Saxon race in this Republic? [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I can not agree with the statement of the gentleman entirely.

Mr. CLINE. We have flattered ourselves that we assumed a "manifest destiny" when we subjugated the Philippines and took them and their lands over. That is, I suppose, the position taken by my friend from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and that was the justification of Mr. Froude in his work, "The English in the West Indies," when he used this language:

> We have another function such as the Romans had. The sections of men on this globe are unequally gifted. Some are strong and can govern themselves; some are weak and are the prey of foreign invaders or of internal anarchy; and freedom, which we all desire, is only attainable by weak nations when they are subject to the rule of others who are powerful and just. This was the duty that fell to the Latin nations 2,000 years ago. In these modern times it has fallen to us.

Mr. Froude should have anticipated to-day, when Premier Asquith has forced through the British House of Commons a constitutional government for Ireland, as some compensation for a century of cruel and unwarranted oppression. It ought not to be forgotten that the struggle of the Boers in South Africa was against English exploitation. A philosophy of that character, that has nothing to commend it but brute force, does not appeal to the intelligence of this age. A government of a people by another people does not and can not exist. Either the people govern themselves or they are governed by a supply government, administered from home, hated, scorned, because it invites men to dream of liberty that can not be realized and in its installation proclaims the inferiority of the subject and his inability to govern himself. Let me remark further, in connection with the statement from John Stuart Mill—> that there is no alien community, either of race or color, but what is better satisfied with an inferior form of government administered by themselves than with a superior form of government administered by an alien.

Not only do we hold the Philippines against their will—and I digress long enough to say that it is a matter of common knowledge that American supremacy is not wanted in the islands by that people—but we have appropriated their lands by the thousands of acres and parceled them out to other aliens for personal benefit and exploitation.

The position of the Democratic Party, standing by its traditions and those of its founder, believing in the principles of personal liberty and in their fullest enjoyment by all people, regardless of color or location, refuses to indorse the policy of subjugation that the dominant party had inaugurated with such enthusiasm. It has made itself clear on the proposition in the last four national conventions. In 1900 the Democratic Party in national convention said:

> * * * We favor an immediate declaration of the Nation's purpose to give the Filipinos, first, a stable form of government; second, independence; and third, protection from outside interference such as has been given for nearly a century to the Republics of Central and South America.

In 1904 the Democratic Party in national convention duly assembled made another declaration on the Philippine problem, as follows:

> We insist that we ought to do for the Filipinos what we have done already for the Cubans, and it is our duty to make the promise now and upon suitable guaranties of protection to citizens of our own and other countries resident there at the time of our withdrawal, set the Filipino people on their feet, free and independent to work out their own destiny.

In 1908 the party, still expressing the sentiment of the great body of the American people on this same question, said:

> We favor an immediate declaration of the Nation's purpose to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as soon as a stable government can be established, such independence to be guaranteed by us as we guarantee the independence of Cuba, until the neutralization of the islands can be secured by treaty with other powers.

In the recent Baltimore convention we said:

> We favor an immediate declaration of the Nation's purpose to recognize the independence of the Philippine Islands as soon as a stable government can be established, such independence to be guaranteed by us till the neutralization of the islands can be secured by treaty with other powers.

The Democratic Party, having made those declarations in the several national conventions, is only doing its duty when it comes into power to say officially what it did in its national councils. So believing, I introduced on June 16, 1911, in this Congress, the following House joint resolution:

> To authorize the President of the United States to take measures for the delivery of possession, control, and government of the Philippine Islands to the Filipino people, and to promote their future independence by treaties of neutrality.
> Resolved, etc., That it is the purpose of the United States to withdraw sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to permit the Filipino people to establish for themselves an independent representative government, such withdrawal of sovereignty to be completed in July, 1920.

SEC. 2. (a) That in pursuance of the execution of such declared purpose on the part of the United States, and to aid and assist the Filipino people to assume such independent government, they shall be permitted to elect the upper branch of the Philippine Legislature, now known as the Philippine Commission, at the first general election after January 1, 1913.

(b) That after January 1, 1917, the Filipino people may assemble in delegate convention to ordain a constitution for the permanent government of the islands, which, when so ordained, shall be submitted to the President and Congress of the United States for approval.

(c) That said constitution shall contain an educational qualification for suffrage, providing that the right of suffrage shall be limited to those who can read and write some recognized language.

(d) That the executive power of the government of the Philippines shall reside in and be exercised by the United States as fully in all respects as at present until the date of evacuation.

(e) That from now until the final withdrawal of its sovereignty the United States will conserve for the Filipino people the natural resources of the islands, including lands, minerals, timber, and water power.

(f) That at the time of the withdrawal of the United States from the occupancy of the islands the President of the United States may reserve such coaling and naval supply stations, and the right to defend them, as in his judgment may seem proper.

SEC. 3. That pending the creation of such independent form of government by the Filipinos and in the promotion thereof the President of the United States is enjoined to consider the practicability of securing a treaty among the principal powers of the world to assure the complete neutrality and independence of the Philippine Islands and favored trade relations between the Philippine Islands and the signatory powers.

SEC. 4. That the policy herein declared is subject to modification in the event that pending the arrival of the time herein fixed for the withdrawal of sovereignty from the Philippine Islands the Filipino people shall engage in armed revolt or insurrection against the authority of the United States.

Following the introduction of the resolution other gentlemen introduced similar resolutions that undoubtedly have been of service to the committee in formulating the present bill under consideration and which has my unqualified support.

While I believe the Filipinos are to-day capable of self-government, as I shall hereafter attempt to establish, I also believe under the great considerations of life and treasure that we have expended in their welfare that we should doubly safeguard a home government for them, establishing beyond question all these necessary elements upon which to build the superstructure. They should be gradually led up to the point of unquestioned efficiency. The bill provides that they shall be permitted to elect the upper house of their legislature. We provide in a constitution that it should contain a qualification for suffrage, and that the constitution should be approved by the President and the Congress of the United States; that during all this period up to 1921 the National Government should retain all the executive powers in the islands, and on our removal therefrom retain sufficient ground for a coaling and supply station. We ought to do another thing to establish and maintain the confidence of the Filipino people in ourselves during this period, and that is that we should maintain their natural resources—mineral, timber, water-power sites, and their vacant lands—and that they should not be exploited by promoters of home corporations. That to guarantee and protect their interest in this new-born civic relation to the Governments of the world we should urge upon the President the necessity of negotiating neutrality with these great powers for their safety. We provide further in this bill reported by the committee that if there should be any armed revolt against our Government during the period between now and 1921 that our proposition would be subject to modification. It is the purpose of the bill to throw about the Filipino all the environments that this great Government could, so that they would focus their entire effort in preparing themselves to assume the discharge of those functions that belong to a free people.

Before proceeding further with this discussion, I call attention to a short series of unsupported statements filed by the minority members of the Committee on Insular Affairs against this bill and denominated "Views of the minority."

As an exhibition of duplicity of statement and unsteady English it merits consideration. The views are opened by this statement:

The inhabitants of the Philippine Islands do not constitute a homogeneous people.

In answer to that I quote from volume 2, page 44, Philippine Census of 1903. That shows that less than one-tenth of 1 per cent of the inhabitants of the islands are mixed either in blood or color. The same authority, page 9, states:

As compared with the Twelfth Census of the United States these of the Philippine Census—are somewhat simpler, the difference being due to the more homogeneous character of the population of the Philippine Islands.

Referring to tables—

The second unsupported statement in the "views" is as follows:

They are composed of many different tribes, some styled civilized and some admittedly wholly wild. There are some 15 or 20 different languages or dialects. In many instances those who speak one dialect can not speak or understand any other. Only about 10 per cent of all the people can read or write in any language or dialect, and less than 3 per cent have what we would call a common-school education.

To completely refute such gross misstatements, I quote from volume 2, Census of 1903—10 years ago—page 90:

Out of a total population 10 years of age and over 20 per cent can read or write or both, and of the males of voting population 31.4 per cent can read and write.

These people received their education before the date of American occupation. What would be the percentage now, 10 years after the complete establishment of a school system and after it is now estimated that millions of children, young men, and women of the Philippines have entered upon a course of education? And at this point I desire to call attention to a paragraph in the message of the Acting Governor General to the Third Philippine Legislature, dated at Manila, October 16, 1912, as follows. I quote from page 4:

A general educational system was inaugurated in the beginning. More than half a million students are attending school as these lines are written. For several years the average has been nearly as great, so that we can say that between three and four million students have had greater or less advantages in the public schools of the Philippine Islands. Many private schools are also serving the people. Each year adds to the number of mature age who have received some school training.

And your attention is invited especially to the following statement in the same connection:

In these modern days every civilized country is developing in democracy. Whatever form that this government may assume, it must be based upon the democratic idea of a government by the people. It is not enough that a few people shall be educated in high schools or universities, but all should have sufficient general education to enable them to take an intelligent place in the electorate.

To return again to the proposition, I now quote from the Census of 1903, page 78, that shows that of the Philippine population 10 years of age and over, there were 2,211,433 who could read or write, or 44.5 per cent of the population. That was a decade ago. I also quote from the director of education, eleventh annual report, to show that there are 50,140 persons who have received advanced education in the colleges and universities and private schools of the island. So eager are the inhabitants of the Philippines for the benefits that flow from a common-school education that in the island of Luzon alone there were 4,000 children that were denied educational advantages because there were neither teachers nor school room. Fifty per cent of the graduates from the high schools of the island go into the universities. The University of the Philippines, opened only three years ago, has more than 1,200 students registered. Even in the Moro Provinces there are 142 schools and 195 Christian Filipino teachers, which the "views" tell us are the deadly foes of the Moros, and these teachers are educating more than 5,000 children, and some from these Provinces are now pursuing courses of study in the university.

I quote again from the Philippine census—volume 2, page 75—showing that even in the most uncivilized section 13 per cent of the people either read or write their own dialect, and this was 10 years ago. I submit that the statement made in the "Views of the minority" is not supported by to-day's conditions. Such statements are an injustice to the Filipinos, for whom these gentlemen profess such deep solicitation.

Another statement that will bear a little scrutiny is the one in which a defense is made for American occupation in that the islands afford us a great market for our foreign trade. I quote from the minority report, page 5, as follows:

On the other hand, the largely increased markets afforded by the Philippines for the products of our farms and our factories is of a great deal of value to us.

I presume if they are of value to us it is because their markets yield us a profit. Let us see what the trade with the Philippines was last year. We received in imports from the islands last year $21,517,777. We sold to the Philippines $20,096,522. It cost us, at a very conservative estimate, $40,000,000 to administer our theory of "benevolent assimilation." If we had all the trade, both exports and imports, given us we would still be nominally only even with the game. Such palpable mistatements do discredit to the high character of the man who makes them. Gentleman assert that the proponents of this bill want to set the Philippines adrift, subject them to the prey of other nations as a prize for warlike ambitions. If the Governments of the earth are so anxious to grab the Philippines why have they not seized Siam, that independent Government of 6,000,000 people, lying between the French and English possessions in southern Asia? Siam has maintained an independent sovereignty under its present dynasty for a longer period than this Republic has stood—a nation without a navy, without an army, and 70 per cent of its people illiterate. The concluding statement of the "views" is as follows:

It would be a cowardly shrinking of duty, a disgrace to the American people, and an injury to the Filipinos to give them self-government before they are fitted for it.

No one disputes the truth of that statement. It is a more cowardly shrinking from a sacred duty, a deeper disgrace for the American people under our declaration of inalienable rights, and a greater injury to refuse to give the Filipinos self-government when they are fitted for it. The question turns upon the proposition, Are they qualified for self-government?

I shall digress here for a moment's treatment of the criticism administered to the Democratic Party by the present administration. The President, for whom I have the highest personal regard, has invoked every opportunity, not only in public addresses but in a message to Congress, vehemently attacking the Democratic Party in its proposed redemption of its platform pledges. He assumes a monopoly of information and opinion on the Philippine problem and expresses his disgust if they are questioned. The President's opinion, which has been given all the currency that the press could afford him, does not express the views of the people. Neither the President nor his party has ever given in a concrete statement its attitude on the Philippine problem or informed that struggling people what may be expected from them. I quote the following as the last declaration of the party on this subject, made at the Chicago convention, in 1912:

The Philippine policy of the Republican Party has been and is inspired by the belief that our duty toward the Filipino people is a national obligation which should remain entirely free from partisan politics.

A more studious attempt to avoid the whole question could hardly have been made. Since it has become a certainty that the Democratic Party would be returned to power every possible agency that could be invoked—political, commercial, or otherwise—has been drafted to create public sentiment in the minds of the people and to induce the Democratic Party to abandon its platform declarations. A cabal of interests involving many persons in the civil service in the Philippines has joined the administration in its efforts to prevent legislation and to continue in power the present "domination of an oligarchical and probably exploiting minority" in the archipelago. The press has been filled with letters from people connected with the administration in the Philippines that a mere cursory examination will disclose are the product of concerted design. None of these letters give any credit to the Filipino people for their successes in attempting to patriotically and honestly advance the material interests of the country. No credit is given the men and women scattered everywhere throughout the islands, fired by a patriotic devotion for the permanent and social uplift of the people. All credit is taken by the administration, and after a complete exposition of the Moro Provinces, in which all the discreditable conditions imaginable are charged to the entire Filipino people, these letters express the deep solicitude that the Filipinos shall be given their independence "when they are fitted for it." The Democratic Party will not hinge its actions in legislating for eight millions of people upon press reports inspired by personal and private interests. An administration that has not been free from scandal, even in the Philippines—that was rebuked by the people in November as no administration in the history of the country has been; that succeeded by its course and conduct in sending a great political party to the scrap heap—ought to manifest some modesty in insisting that its foreign policy should be imitated by its successor.

But to return to the question of qualification for self-government, I submit the statement made by Dr. Schurman, president of Cornell University, made 10 years ago, when he was a member of the first Philippine Commission. If he could make such a statement 10 years ago, what could he say now, after the advancement the inhabitants have made? Dr. Schurman said:

But whatever may be done with the Mohammedans, the civilized and Christianized democracy of Luzon and the Visayans desire independence. They are fairly entitled to it, and, united as they are now, I think they might very soon be intrusted with it. In their educated men, as thorough gentlemen as one meets in Europe or America, this democracy of 6,500,000 Christians has its foreordained leaders.

I invite your attention to the ability demonstrated by the members of the Philippine Assembly. There are some opportunities that we have extended to the Filipinos, which they have eagerly embraced, that constitutes an impeachment of the statement made by the friends of subjugation that the Philipinos were incapable of self-government. In 1905 we passed an act that established what is known as the Philippine Assembly. It provided, among other things, that within two years after there should be a census taken of the inhabitants of the islands, and that a general election should be held to elect from each of the several districts a representative in the assembly.

The bill provided that there should not be more than 100 or less than 50 districts, and the representation should be fixed according to the completion of the census, and, the necessary steps taken, the islands constituting the Philippines were divided for legislative purposes into 80 districts, and the representation fixed at 90,000 for each representative. The Legislature of the Philippines consists of the assembly and the Philippine Commission, the commission conforming to our Senate, made up of nine members appointed by the President of the United States, five of whom are Americans and four Filipinos. The Congress of the United States was organized under our Constitution for 60 years before a Representative in this body represented 90,000 inhabitants. We were organized on a basis of 30,000 to each Representative, only one-third of what the Filipino was supposed to be able to represent. We made no mistake in the Philippine representation, either, for the reason that the assembly has shown itself to be able and patriotic in the discharge of its duty and has a creditable place with other great legislative bodies. We thought so well of the Filipino as to his ability to govern himself and his country that we gave him concurrent jurisdiction with the commission in all matters of legislation, except for the non-Christian tribes. We organized the assembly along the same lines that the House of Representatives is organized. It has the right to initiate all bills for the raising of revenue. One of the first acts of the Philippine Assembly was to take from the speaker the right to be a member of the rules committee—a reform that we made after they had set the example for us. It has been widely proclaimed by the friends of this "benevolent assimilation" that there was no national sentiment among the Filipinos, and consequently no desire for self-government. Out of the 80 representatives to the assembly 64 were elected upon the issue of immediate independence and the other 16 were for independence after better developed conditions. As a further evidence of a prevailing national spirit, I quote from a recent article in the American Political Science Monthly, written by James Alexander Robertson, librarian of the Philippine Library, a keen observer of events, and not in harmony with the idea of independence. This article was written as a review of the first regular and special session in 1909, and is found in the November, 1910, issue. It reads:

The delegates, although elected to represent a certain district locally, are keenly alive to the fact that they represent all the Philippines and must obtain the best good for the whole country.

And again in the same article:

If the leaders proceed with the wisdom that Rizal had, it is not too much to say that the Philippine Assembly will have permanently an honored place among the deliberative assemblies of the world.

How could the Philippine Assembly be entitled to such a coveted place among the legislative bodies of the world if it had not displayed the patriotism, ability, and public conscience based upon a national policy to merit such consideration? Congress placed in the hands of the assembly the power to originate every line of expenditure in the islands except as indicated.

The conduct of the members of the assembly has met the expectations of the friends of self-government. In the second election of members of the assembly, out of the 81 districts there were 66 members elected who favored immediate independence and 15 who were in favor of deferred independence. Out of the 19 reelections all but 2 were for immediate independence. In the election for governors of the municipalities two years ago the parties divided equally for the 30 cities. At the recent election there were 23 governors elected that favored independence at once and 9 who were in favor of independence deferred, and yet we are told that there is no national spirit in the Philippines. It has been widely published that the small vote cast for the assembly is another evidence of no national spirit. What are the restrictions imposed on suffrage in the Philippines? No man can vote unless he is 23 years of age, owns $250 worth of property, or pays $15 taxes, speaks and writes either Spanish or English, or was an officer above a certain rank in the late Spanish régime. (Act 1582, U. S. P. C., sec. 13.) Had you submitted that kind of a test to the whites and blacks in the South after the war what kind of a vote would you have gotten? If you make that the test of a right to vote in the great cities of this country to-day, what will be the vote? One of the very strongest tests of the ability of the Filipino for self-government is that he holds more than 95 per cent of the offices from judge of the supreme court down through all the clerical positions and discharges his duties with fidelity and ability. They are intrusted with positions of trust and confidence, occupy positions of great responsibility with perfect safety to the service.

What is the test you propose to put the Filipinos to to determine whether they are capable of self-government? Is it to be the character of the work you give him to do, or the manner in which he does it? These are some of the subjects you have committed to his charge and permitted him to appropriate money from the public treasury for construction of highways and bridges, sanitary systems for the cities, river and harbor improvements, educational system for the islands, the establishment of a bureau of labor and a bureau of agriculture, and the establishment of colleges to promote agriculture, irrigation of the islands, the organization of a constabulary for police purposes and protection. On all these subjects he has legislated to the entire satisfaction of the people, and they have indorsed the action of their legislative officers by returning most of them to their positions. On their action, Mr. Robinson, in the article above referred to, they are complimented as patriotic and deserving of recognition among the great legislative bodies of the world. Not only has there been no complaint or criticism of the assembly but no hint even has come from the Government of the commission of any intent to seek the repeal of the law organizing the assembly.

I want to call your attention to the administration of justice in the islands as an indication of the ability of the people to take care of their own interests. These judicial positions are filled with Filipinos of high character, and their work has received the highest commendation for ability and careful and quick dispatch of the business intrusted to them. Every municipality has its local self-government, presided over by native citizens, and the business is transacted in an entirely satisfactory manner.

I call your attention to what Hamilton M. Wright, in his Handbook of the Philippines, says of the morality of the Filipinos:

> There are no more devoted people than the people of the Philippines. Religious worship obtains among all classes. A place of worship is an essential to the life of the people. In every Filipino community, no matter how humble it may be, is to be found a place of worship.

The Filipinos are the only Christian nation in the Eastern Hemisphere. For intelligence and patriotism they are not to be compared to any other Asiatic race. Heathen China has been able to establish a republic and receive congratulation from the great nations of the world in an effort to establish an independent republic, based largely upon the American Constitution in its structure. Does anyone want to put the Chinese under a system of benevolent assimilation to ascertain whether they are capable of self-government? No one has advanced any such proposition.

Another evidence of the capabilities of the Filipino is demonstrated in the progress made in the public schools since American occupation. As far back as 1867 there were 1,674 public schools in the islands, and this number had increased in 1898 to 2,146. The interest in the cause of education is shown by the fact that as soon as the Filipino people were able to wrest their government from Spanish domination they established a system of education, and made the attendance compulsory. As soon as the United States took control of the Philippines a system of education was inaugurated, and in 1903 the enrollment of the Filipino pupils reached 182,202, which in the year 1910 had reached the number of 610,493, and the number of teachers had increased to 9,176, of whom 8,493 were Filipinos. The advancement which the Filipinos have made is well illustrated by the following quotation from the message of the Governor General to the Philippine Legislature, under date of December 16, 1912. I quote from page 2:

> Not in Manila alone, but throughout the archipelago may be found earnest and able men devoted to the cause of the people and fired with the highest ambition for the material uplift of those about them. No wonder, then, that with limited revenues and conditions untoward in many respects the result of their labors and ambitions are marked to-day by a condition of well being and opportunity heretofore unknown in the Philippine Islands.

This general education will only increase the problem for this Government. Since 1903, according to the authority I have just quoted, we have had more than 4,000,000 of the inhabitants from the Philippines in the public schools of the islands. By 1921, if this progress continues, the dissemination of knowledge and the growth of their material interests continue, what will this mighty leverage do for the Filipino people? The spread of general intelligence of this age is not in harmony with the theory that the Filipino will remain the ward of the Republic. Let me speak plainly. If we shall have made progress correspondingly in the islands from now until 1921 that we have since 1903, and after being under our sovereignty for nearly a quarter of a century, equipped in every way to govern themselves, is it too much for us to expect that if we refuse them that demand for independent sovereignty that they will not ally themselves with some other power that will give it to them? The highest evidence of competency will arise out of a splendid school system, a religious devotion, a high morality, all of which are inconsistent in this age with national dependency and race servitude to an alien power.

We ought to get out of the islands as a matter of political expediency, barring our immoral right to hold the islands and the injustice of maintaining our supremacy. I want to invite the attention of the House to the cost to us of assimilating the brown man of the "Gem of the Orient" with the white man of this Christian Nation. The immense treasure we have expended and shall continue to spend staggers the comprehension. Our first two years' war wih Spain and the occupation of the Philippines cost the Government the sum of $691,521,723.03. This is the compilation shown by the clerks of the Committee on Appropriations in the House and Senate.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Does that include the $200,000,000 of bonds issued?

Mr. CLINE. It does.

Mr. SHERWOOD. It is exclusive of that?

Mr. CLINE. I think not. Our appropriations for the Army in 1899, made of course before the declaration of war in 1898, was $23,193,392, and the next year it leaped to $80,430,206.06. The next year to $93,374,755.97, an increase of seventy millions in two years for the Army, four times as much as we paid for the Alaska and Louisiana Purchase, out of the latter of which we have carved some of the great States of this federation.

The appropriation for the Navy for 1898 was $33,003,234.68. It jumped to $56,098,783.68 the next year, an increase of more than twenty-three millions. It continued to increase until in 1910 it was $136,935,199.05, an increase of more than 400 per cent over the appropriations of 14 years ago. This year the appropriation is $126,478,338.24. We have appropriated a thousand millions more for the Navy alone since we entered upon this beautiful theory of benevolent assimilation in 14 years than we did the previous 14 years. It has been estimated by those who are in a position to know that the maintenance of the Army and necessary Navy in the Philippines costs us $40,000,000 a year and that the cost to the American people in this project of territorial acquisition has cost us in the 14 years more than a thousand millions of dollars, and by 1921 we shall have added to that immense amount drawn from the savings of the people in the experiment of territorial expansion, four hundred millions more, an absolute loss of that vast sum of money unless we count the investment as a benevolence to the Filipino. And that is not the most serious aspect. I quote from a speech made by the late Senator Hale in reporting the naval appropriation bill made March 3, 1904, carrying more than ninety-seven millions. He said:

> If we ever get into war, no matter with whom, the first thing we will have to do will be to spend hundreds of millions of dollars to protect the Philippines.

But that is not the whole cost to us. Since our expansion program was instituted we have pensioned more than 25,000 soldiers; there are now on the rolls 23,382, as many pensioners on the rolls charged to the Philippine service as there were soldiers in the whole standing army of the Government for 30 years before the Philippine struggle, and that does not include the pension to widows of those who have died.

I have no complaint to make in that direction. We ought to pension those who go into that service and suffer in health due to their enlistment. We paid the soldiers of the Spanish-American and the Philippine War last year $3,111,000, and this burden, for it is a burden—and I say it not complaining—will increase as the years go by. If we shall continue to increase the number on the rolls at this rate, till we are as far away from the date of our occupation as we are from the Civil War we will have added $10,000,000 annually to our expenditures for Philippine service. I make no objections to pensions so long as Congress permits the Government to take men into the Philippines to maintain subjugation. It ought to pay the price. The way to keep the pensions down is to get out of the Philippines while we can do so honorably.

A very large portion of the increased Army and Navy is due directly to our "benevolent assimilation." Let me analyze for a minute. What would the money do for the improvement of our internal resources if spent in this country if our expenditure is $40,000,000 a year? In 10 years we could construct from the interior to the sea a complete system of national waterway, establishing cheap freight rates that would be a benefit to 100,000,000 people; or in one year we could construct all the coastwise trading vessels that we needed for our South American trade; or we could maintain yearly a million miles of highways for the delivery of United States mail; or we could, in two years, build and equip with a million-dollar sinking fund a mechanical and industrial school in every State in the Union.

Mr. Speaker, the great sea battles of the future will be fought in the eastern Pacific and Indian Oceans; fought for two purposes—supremacy in the Far East and for the liberation from alien rule. If we are wise, we will neither seek to take part for the former cause or resist the latter. It is enough for us to remain master and in peaceful possession of this seabound continent of the western world, where the genius and industry of our people will find a fruitful field for centuries to come in the unlimited resources, where this crowning civilization of ours shall continue to lead with "kindly light" the races of the earth to a freer, happier, and more enlightened existence. Though we stand between the European Continent and the Pacific, its vastness is so great that no naval power in the West can command it. I quote from Mr. Putman Weald, in his Conflict of Color, "that no nation or combinations of nations can control it."

Men trained in the evolution of war in our own Navy know this fact. They further know and have asserted it, that no western nation could maintain inself in Asiatic waters against the powers there. That ward of ours, the Philippines, is at the mercy of the Asiatic powers, if they combine, no matter what our alliances are in the west. We can not control the trend of political thought or repress it by military and naval forces. If we are to have a hand in Asiatic development, it must be in some other way than by force of arms. I speak to sane and thoughtful men; our vast coast line, our possessions separated from us by thousands of miles, our vulnerable points of attack in the Tropics, makes the hope of naval and military supremacy for us in the Far East a delusion and its realization an impossibility. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, discussing the peace treaties with Great Britain and France recently in the Senate, said "war between the United States and England or between the United States and France was inconceivable, if not impossible."

If that be true, and I believe it is true, how insane the thought of subjugating or even maintaining supremacy in the Far East in the event of war. There are measures of self-protection that we may employ for our preservation. There is now pending before the Interparliamentary Union that met in Geneva, Switzerland, last autumn, the greatest proposition ever submitted by a congregation of civilized powers. This is the resolution:

Provided, That the several Governments be required, in arbitration or other treaties, to be considered in the future, a preamble providing that they mutually recognize, first, their natural independence; second, their territorial integrity; and third, their absolute sovereignty in domestic affairs.

We are in an age of constitutional and representative government. The silent forces of that change are seen everywhere as the evolution of the races shall proceed; the influence of our example will be felt. The trade that will flow through the Panama gateway, more than anything else, will transform the world and claim for us recognition for high national character and dispensation of justice to all men. If we shall have our way, our supreme desire will be that all those forces that make for peace and happiness, our prosperity as a Republic, and a commercial Nation shall be made secure. The overwhelming force of the western world's neutrality will, if we are wise, make for our security in the East. Our peril lies in our failure to bind them to us by those treaty provisions that they will love us for those rights we extend to other nations that we enjoy ourselves. Our nobleness that we have enkindled in the breasts of other races has inspired in them our hopes and our destinies.

It was the province of this Republic to illustrate to the world one principle—the principle of self-government anchored within the doctrine of personal liberty. To do that, in the language of that renowned French publicist, Bagehot, we have "exaggerated the idea." We have given it all the prominence that a mighty people could summon. We have so filled the public mind, not only of our own land, but in the west, with the theory that we are bound to each other by that cement which flows from an all-engrossing overwhelming purpose. For a century and a half we have had but one object to which we have given the highest consideration and self-committed devotion. Men with matchless fortitude and unequaled bravery have dared to sacrifice all and do all to perpetuate and exalt the common cause of personal freedom. It is the ideal toward the perfection of which we bend every energy and every hope. [Applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks, the time of Mr. CLINE having expired, Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio yielded to him five minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] to explain the bill. [Applause.]

[Mr. BURLESON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CLARK of Florida having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1072) to amend section 895 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 18787) relating to the limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon a public work of the United States and of the District of Columbia, and of all persons employed in constructing, maintaining, or improving a river or harbor of the United States and of the District of Columbia, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BORAH, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. SHIVELY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 8279. An act to amend an act approved October 1, 1890, entitled "An act to set apart certain tracts of land in the State of California as forest reservations."

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, and read as follows:

Building inspection division: Inspector of buildings, $3,000; principal assistant inspector of buildings, $1,800; assistant inspectors of buildings—11 at $1,200 each; fire-escape inspector, $1,400; temporary employment of additional assistant inspectors for such time as their services may be necessary, $3,000; civil engineers or computers—1, $1,800; 1, $1,500; chief clerk, $1,500; clerks—1 at $1,050, 1 at $1,000, 1, who shall be a stenographer and typewriter, $1,000; 1 at $900; messenger, $480; assistant inspector, $1,500.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph that there are some items in it not authorized by existing law. And in order to facilitate matters I will say that at the top of page 2 the words "additional compensation for two assistants to the engineer commissioner, detailed from the Engineer Corps of the United States Army under act of June 11, 1878, two at $250 each," is not authorized by law.

Then, in line 7, "one, $1,400." That contains an increase of $100, and I make the point of order against that also.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the point of order is well taken. The item providing for additional compensation to two assistants to the engineer commissioner has been carried in the bill for a number of years, and was embodied in the bill in order to save expense. An additional officer was estimated for by the District Commissioners for the purpose of superintending the building at the time the item was embodied in the bill.

The estimate had been forwarded to the House, and they urged the creation of an additional office, the office of superintendent of the District Building, at a salary estimated at $2,000 or $2,400. The subcommittee dealing with the matter reached the conclusion that the officer was unnecessary, that by imposing the additional duty upon the assistant engineer commissioners and allowing them $250 each we could obviate the necessity for creating the new office, and for that reason we embodied this item in the bill, I think, three or four years ago. It was at the time that we took charge of the new municipal building. As I understand it, even if there had been no officer or office of this character authorized, the fact that it had been embodied in an appropriation bill and carried for three or four years is sufficient authority under the rules of the House for again embodying it in an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to be heard on the point of order against the item of $1,400 in line 7?

Mr. BURLESON. No, Mr. Chairman; I only desire to state that this is an office that has been carried in the bill for a number of years at $1,300, and the subcommittee at this time, upon the urgent insistence of the Commissioners of the District, increased the salary of the person holding it $100, they giving us the reasons why the increase should be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The point of order is sustained on both items. The point of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky was against the paragraph. Does the gentleman from Kentucky modify it so that he lodges it against the two items mentioned?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to make it against these two items. With those two corrections, I have nothing against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained as the gentleman from Kentucky modifies it.

Mr. BURLESON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to insert, in line 7, page 2, after the figures "$1,500," the words and figures, "one, $1,400."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 7, by inserting, after the figures "$1,500," "1 $1,400."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURLESON. I understand that the Chair sustains the point of order against the words "additional compensation for two assistant commissioners to the engineer commissioner detailed from the Engineer Corps of the United States Army under act of June 11, 1878, 2 at $250 each."

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the Chair sustains the point of order against those words, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Purchasing division: Purchasing officer, $3,000; deputy purchasing officer, $1,600; computer, $1,440; clerk, $1,500; clerks—1, $1,450; 6, at $1,200 each; 3, at $900 each; 6, at $720 each; inspector of fuel, $1,500; assistant inspector of fuel, $1,100; storekeeper, $900; messenger, $600; driver, $480; inspector, $900; inspector, $780; 2 laborers, at $600 each; 2 property-yard keepers, at $1,000 each; inspector of materials, $1,200; temporary labor, $150.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph because there are items contained in it that are not authorized by law. In order to facilitate matters, I will make my objections specifically known. In line 17, page 2, there is a provision for one clerk at $1,450. That is an increase of $100. In line 21, page 2, there is a provision for two property-yard keepers. That is the creation of an additional office. That should be one instead of two.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I will state that the point of order against the first item is well taken and I concede it. With reference to the second item, I desire to state to the gentleman that the District Commissioners directed our attention to the fact that the assistant property-yard keeper was performing exactly the same service that is being performed by the property-yard keeper, and they thought it was only just and fair that his salary should be equalized with the salary of the property-yard keeper. It was for that reason that we created the additional office of property-yard keeper, eliminating the office of assistant property-yard keeper, and putting them on an equality. If that does not appeal to the gentleman, of course the point of order will be well taken.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I contend that it is not well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I thought the gentleman was through, and I wish to be heard for a moment on the point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I concede that the point of order made to the item providing for a clerk at $1,450, in line 17, is well taken. I do not concede the proposition that the other point of order is well taken.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think there is no provision of law outside of the appropriation bill for any of the officers named in this paragraph, unless it be the purchasing officer. I do not remember about that. I am quite sure there is no legislative provision of law providing for the computers, or the clerks, or the inspectors of fuel, or the assistant inspectors of fuel, or the storekeepers, or the messenger, or the driver, or any of the other officers named in the paragraph, and the question is whether, without a specific provision of law naming these officers, Congress can make an appropriation under its authority to make an appropriation for carrying on the expenses of the District of Columbia. I think the rulings have been numerous that these various items in the District of Columbia appropriation bill were warranted by the organic law creating the District and providing for the government of the District. It is certain that if a point of order will lie against the two property-yard keepers, then it will lie against one property-yard keeper, because it never has been held that an increase in the number of officials in an appropriation bill, where the number is not fixed by legislative enactment, is subject to a point of order. For instance, in the Post Office appropriation bill every year we necessarily increase the number of clerks and carriers. We specify in the Post Office appropriation bill the number of clerks at the different grades of salaries. It is necessary for the maintenance of the Post Office Department that Congress have the power to increase the number in the current bill beyond the number in the current law. It is within the power of Congress, if we can appropriate for these offices at all, to specify the number for which we appropriate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, there is no sort of doubt that every item in that paragraph is subject to a point of order. Not a single, solitary officer in that list has ever been authorized by law. They have been carried for a number of years, but no man can find authorization for one of them. Those offices are necessary, some of them at least, and because they are I do not choose to make the point of order against all of them, but I know that there are idle men in that department, and that the number of idle men may not be unnecessarily increased is the reason why I have made the point of order against the creation of another office.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] that these two property-yard keepers are not necessary is one thing. I do not know anything about that. But that does not affect the question of the point of order. The question here is, and it runs all through this bill—because there are very few positions in this bill that are created by legislative enactment—whether Congress, having passed a law providing for the District of Columbia for the purchase of property, for the ownership of property, for the care and protection of property is under that authority, authorized to provide those officials which Congress thinks are necessary to carry out the business of the organic law providing for the government of the District of Columbia?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I have sent out for the statute, but following the same line of argument that I have been undertaking to present, I wish to state that when authority of law is given for a policy to be pursued, or carried out by a department, or bureau, as for instance, when a department is authorized to make an investigation, or to bring about certain results, the number of officials or agents that may be appropriated for by the committee as being necessary for the investigation, or to secure the results, is a question of discretion to be exercised by the Committee on Appropriations. The authority to make the investigation, or to take the steps contemplated, must be afforded by positive law. We submit that existing law authorizes the employment of these officials, and thereby affords this committee the authority to appropriate for their payment. It is certainly within the proper province of this committee to provide for the salaries of the officials, or agents created pursuant to law. I deny that there is any specific limitation in any act to the effect that only one property yard keeper shall be appointed. No such limitation existing, two such keepers may be appointed, and it is within the discretion of the Appropriations Committee to provide for the salaries of the same. The crux of the matter is whether there is authority to appoint one. If such authority exists without limitation, two may be appointed. The Committee on Appropriations were satisfied on investigation, that two of these officials were needed, and hence made provision for their payment. We submit this matter to the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois has referred to the Post Office appropriation bill. That is quite a different matter from the District appropriation bill. The District appropriation bill must not contain an office which has not been authorized under what is known as the organic act of June 11, 1878, or by some amendment thereto. That organic act, taken in connection with that which preceded it, doing away with the territorial form of government, passed June 20, 1874, provides that the commissioners shall not create any offices. That does not mean, of course, that Congress can not create them; but Congress has not passed a law creating any of these offices, and because points of order have not been made against any of the rest of them is no reason why the point of order should not be sustained as against this one.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky permit this inquiry? If a department or a division exists by authority of law, say of the organic act, which does not fix salaries either in the amount or number of employees in connection with that department or division, nor the particular title by which their office would be known or designated; now, if that be the fact and then thereafter Congress proceeds to legislate by making appropriation to any given amount for given employees for the purpose of carrying out the duties devolving upon that division or department, and if after they have created a certain number as necessary for the carrying on of the work of that department and having fixed their salaries and given the titles of the officers, say, as in this case, one property yard keeper, at $1,000 per annum, such employee or officer not being named in the statute in any way; then if thereafter the Appropriations Committee bring in an additional employee in connection with that department, there being no limit in the law as to the number of employees in that department or number of any particular class of employees in that particular department, does the gentleman contend that before that one particular laborer or property yard keeper can be authorized and cared for by an appropriation that there would have to be a specific act of Congress creating the office or officer of that division or that department?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I do in the District of Columbia bill, but I do not contend for it in other bills. This comes under the act of June 11, 1878, and from the passage of that act there has been no such thing created by law as any of these officers except the purchasing officer himself. As for the property yards, there is no legislation creating them or creating any of these positions that are named under them. There is a purchasing agent authorized by law, but none of those named in the paragraph, and as to the property after it is purchased, there is no law directing him what shall be done with it, and, as a matter of fact, the purchasing agent now purchases in very limited quantities, and it is delivered about the District of Columbia in very small quantities, and but recently the Committee on the District of Columbia has filed in the House a report that there should be a warehouse in which to keep these goods. There is none, and this afternoon, the item having been left out of the bill, the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] has just dropped in the basket a bill to provide for a warehouse where these things may be kept, and that bill names the officers who are to preside over that warehouse, and that bill undertakes to cure the very defect that is here.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Before the Chair rules, and if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] has finished, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the following section and to say in this connection that it is conceded that if this point of order is well taken, it is an exception to the general rule. Hence it must rest upon some provision of law, and I would like to see the particular provision making this exception. If such a provision exists, I am not aware of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the burden is upon them to show that it is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Well, I admit that is true, but if the gentleman is familiar with the section to which he refers, and I am not, I ask him for the convenience of the Chair to cite the book, and page. Otherwise it will be necessary to make an investigation of the law that will delay the progress of the bill. In the meantime, I desire, as I have said to call the attention of the Chair to the following law:

Each head of a department is authorized to employ in his department such number of clerks of the several classes recognized by the law, and such messengers, assistant messengers, copyists, watchmen, laborers, and other employees, and at such rates of compensation respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

In this connection the following ruling has been made. The general law authorizing the employment in the executive departments of such clerks as may be appropriated for, is held to authorize appropriations for clerkships not otherwise authorized. (IV Hinds, sec. 3675.) Moreover when a department is created for a declared purpose, an appropriation for the instrumentalities to carry out this purpose, is authorized. (IV Hinds, sec. 3615.)

The CHAIRMAN. May I ask the gentleman if that is not the law relating to the executive departments of the Government which we ordinarily know as departments headed by Cabinet officers?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I now cite the Chair to this further section:

The commissioners are authorized to abolish any office, to consolidate two or more offices, to reduce the number of employees, to remove from office, and to make appointments to any office under them authorized by law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. "Authorized by law." There is not any question about that.

Mr. SAUNDERS. There is no question about that. But what I was going to say to the Chair was that the language "authorized by law" in nowise differs in effect from the language "as may be appropriated for by Congress." If they may be appropriated for, they are authorized by law. If they are authorized by law, they may be appropriated for.

The CHAIRMAN. Does not the gentleman concede that if the point of order is made against this item on the ground as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], that it is not authorized by existing law, and if that point is contested by any gentleman or member of the committee, that the burden is on the member of the committee to show authority authorizing such an office and appropriation?

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is true. I admit that, but it is for the Chair to determine whether or not we have sustained the burden.

Now I am not familiar with, in fact have never seen, the section of the law to which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] refers. In the absence of that statute, I refer the Chair to the sections cited as ample authority for the action of the Committee on Appropriations to which objection is made. I might also say, that we rely upon the general rule, and if it is contended that an exception exists in the case of this particular bill, the burden is on the party making the point of order to furnish the authority creating the exception. The presumption would be that the rule is universal, until the contrary is shown.

The CHAIRMAN. This question arises on the threshold of taking up the bill, and it may be like questions will again arise throughout the bill, and the Chair is indulging the gentleman at this time so that it can be thrashed out, and if a conclusion can be reached about it now, we might not be put to the necessity of putting further time on it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I find I have a memorandum here, which reads as follows:

The mere appropriation for a salary does not thereby create an office so as to justify appropriations in succeeding years.

My notes refer me to Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, pages 393, 443, and 460, which the Chair has at his disposal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. It is conceded that the point of order made against the item of $1,450, in line 17, is subject to a point of order, being an increase in the salary not authorized by law, and therefore the point of order is sustained.

Mr. BURLESON. Now, before the Chair rules upon the other, I wish to perfect the bill. I offer an amendment——

Mr. MANN. You can not offer an amendment until the point of order is disposed of.

Mr. BURLESON. The Chair did not sustain that point of order.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman made a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I desire to modify the point of order until we reach those two items.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] made a point of order on the provision in reference to the two property-yard keepers. Until that is disposed of the gentleman can not offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. SAUNDERS. If the Chair will permit me I would like to submit to the Chair, in connection with the law cited, some additional authority showing that no such exception exists in the case of this particular bill as is contended for, but that the general principle applicable to the other bills applies as well to this bill.

The Secretary of the Treasury shall carefully consider all estimates submitted to him as above provided, and shall approve, disapprove, or suggest such changes in the same, or any item thereof, as he may think the public interest demands; and after he shall have considered and passed upon such estimates submitted to him, he shall cause to be made a statement of the amount approved by him and the fund or purpose to which each item belongs, which statement shall be certified by him, and delivered, together with the estimates as originally submitted, to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall transmit the same to Congress.

I submit that this section in connection with the other citations, amply supports the right of the committee to make the appropriations recommended for two of these offices, instead of one. In addition, I cite the following extract to which my attention has been called:

To the extent to which Congress shall approve of said estimates, Congress shall appropriate to the amount of 50 per cent thereof.

The items are here; they are estimated for, and the estimates have been approved. In conformity with this estimate the committee has made the proper appropriation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The committee has approved it, Mr. Chairman, but Congress has not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] against the two property yard keepers at $1,000 each, on line 22 of page 2, the point of order being directed to the item as being an increase of one property yard keeper at the salary stated.

The Chair takes cognizance of the fact that the purchasing division is a division of the government of the District of Columbia, necessary and incident to the carrying out of the work relating to that division for the District of Columbia. Now, if that be true and such a division is authorized under the law, and Congress undertakes to provide and does provide for the officers and salaries of that department, there being no express statute limiting the number of employees in it——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Right there, Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will pardon me for one moment, the statute creating the office of purchasing agent does limit it, because it does not go any further. It creates the one, and stops with the one.

The CHAIRMAN. The point as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky proceeds on the assumption, then, that the purchasing division and all its officers and employees, unless he will consider this an exception, would be subject to the same point of order as he makes against this one property yard keeper.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The point of order, I contend, would lie against every officer in that paragraph except the one officer, the purchasing agent, which office has been created by law and none of the others has been.

The CHAIRMAN. That is precisely what the Chair undertook to state, that if the position taken by the gentleman relative to the purchasing officer was correct then the salary of each person in that division would be subject to a point of order if a Member saw fit to make it. In that view the Chair does not concur.

Then, as the Chair was about to state, if the item providing for two property yard keepers in conjunction with this division is reported by the committee, based upon estimates made in conformity with law, it would be not a parliamentary question as to whether two property yard keepers at this day and hour should go into the bill, but would be a matter to be determined by the will of the committee, and therefore the point of order on that item is not sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. After the word "clerks," in line 17, page 2, insert "1 at $1,300."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 17, by inserting, after the word "clerks," the words "1 at $1,300."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Building inspection division: Inspector of buildings, $3,000; principal assistant inspector of buildings, $1,800; assistant inspectors of buildings—11 at $1,200 each; fire-escape inspector, $1,400; temporary employment of additional assistant inspectors for such time as their services may be necessary, $3,000; civil engineers or computers—1 $1,800, 1 $1,500; chief clerk, $1,500; clerks—1 at $1,050, 1 at $1,000, 1 who shall be a stenographer and typewriter, $1,000, 1 at $900; messenger, $480; assistant inspector, $1,500.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the paragraph, especially on page 3, line 5, as to a computer, "1 at $1,800." That is an increase of salary from $1,500.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; I make the point of order.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I think the Chair can dispose of it.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] to reserve his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois reserve his point of order or make it?

Mr. FOWLER. I reserve it.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, the subcommittee, in preparing this bill, constrained by the earnest representations made by the District Commissioners, slightly increased the salary of this officer. The District Commissioners stated that this man was appointed in 1909. They stated, further, that—

This position is a most important one, involving great responsibility and care, and requires a man of high technical training and of exceptional ability. He passes on the structural features of buildings, and permit to build is issued only after approval of plans by him. The increase in the number of large buildings, in the erection of which iron, concrete, and other fire-resisting materials form such a conspicuous structural feature, has necessitated the expenditure of a greater amount of technical labor than has ever heretofore been required. The salary is quite incommensurate with the duties rendered, and is unfair to the type of man necessary to properly fill the position.

I want to state to the committee that the subcommittee, acting upon just such recommendations, have increased the salaries of quite a number of employees in the District service. They did it after giving most careful consideration to the statements made to them by the District Commissioners. I concede that any individual Member, without any investigation whatever, can come here and set up his judgment, based merely upon the reading of an item in the bill, against the judgment of the committee, and that the point of order will be sustained and the item eliminated from the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to call attention to the fact that the committee have been very careful to set out in detail in their report what they have done in each particular instance, so that nothing is concealed or attempted to be concealed.

Mr. BURLESON. I do not intend to consume the time of the House in giving the reasons which prompted us to grant these small increases in the bill.

Mr. FOWLER. I shall be glad to have them.

Mr. BURLESON. We have increased the salaries of 83 employees. Those increases aggregate $15,329. The average increase in each of these salaries is $184.

Mr. SAUNDERS. They are the smaller fish.

Mr. BURLESON. As a general rule they are the officials of the District government who are receiving the smallest salaries.

Your committee have not attempted to conceal from the membership of the House any action that it has taken in connection with this matter. In our report we specifically point out every change that is made in this bill, either in the way of an increase of a salary or the omission of a salary; either in the way of the creation of a new office or the elimination of an office heretofore carried in the bill. Every single item involving a change of legislation is carefully set forth in the report published for the information of this House.

Now, as I have stated, if any individual Member wants to set up his judgment against the judgment of the subcommittee that prepared this bill and the judgment of the entire committee that afterwards gave it their approval, he can do so, and I do not propose to consume the time of the House in making the explanations that moved us to grant these few increases.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I shall be glad to ask the gentleman how many of these increases affect those who are engaged in manual labor in the District of Columbia.

Mr. BURLESON. I will state to the gentleman that most of these increases are for such employees.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. At least 90 per cent.

Mr. BURLESON. The gentleman from Ohio informs me about 90 per cent.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Probably more.

Mr. BURLESON. That 90 per cent are those engaged in manual labor; but I am not able to state it accurately.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman mean to say that 90 per cent of the $15,000 increase applies to those who are engaged in manual labor?

Mr. BURLESON. That is his estimate. I will not attempt to make an estimate. I am unable to state, but I will state that the major portion of these increases are for those who are engaged in manual labor. The gentleman has the report of the committee before him, and that portion of it covers only two pages. He can run through the list and very readily ascertain those who are engaged in manual labor.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not a fact that the increases for those engaged in manual labor are a mere bagatelle?

Mr. BURLESON. I do not think so.

Mr. FOWLER. For instance, about $40 where a man is getting $320 a year, or $40 where a scrub woman is getting $240 a year. In other words, she is to receive a total annual compensation of $280 by your increase. And it is not worthy of the name of an increase; it is an insult to the person who is doing the manual labor. Is it not a fact that you increase others by leaps and bounds, by hundreds of dollars, such as the district attorney, to the amount of $500 at one jump?

Mr. BURLESON. It is not a fact that we are increasing others by leaps and bounds against those engaged in manual labor. There has been a proportionate, fair, just increase in those engaged in manual labor as compared with others. The gentleman has alluded to the corporation counsel. I want to say that he earns every dollar that is being paid him by the District government, and a recommendation has been made year after year that the salary of that official of the District government be increased, and this year the committee yielded to the request of the commissioners, and increased it to the amount that he deserves.

Mr. FOWLER. The committee tried to increase it last year.

Mr. BURLESON. No; they did not.

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; the committee did and a point of order was sustained, and now you come back and try to increase it again. I ask you if you could not get 25 just as good lawyers to take the place for the salary now paid if you would but open the door and let them come in?

Mr. BURLESON. I am quite sure that you could not, and I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I am not responsible for the frailty of his memory when he says that last year we attempted to increase the salary, because I tell you we made no such attempt. In fact, we were subjected to some little criticism because we increased only two salaries in the District of Columbia appropriation bill last year, and those were the salaries of two employees in the Tuberculosis Hospital.

Mr. FOWLER. I know that you did not increase the salary of the district attorney, but you tried to do it.

Mr. BURLESON. I say again that I am not responsible for the frailty of the memory of the gentleman from Illinois that makes him reiterate that statement when I state to him that the committee increased only two salaries, and were subjected to some little criticism because we did not increase others.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman mean to say that the salary of the district attorney was not reported from his committee in the bill recommending that the salary be increased to $5,000?

Mr. BURLESON. That is exactly what I mean to say.

Mr. FOWLER. And does the gentleman mean to say that a point of order was not sustained to that effort to make the increase?

Mr. BURLESON. That is just exactly what I mean to say, positively and emphatically; that we made no such effort. The gentleman's memory evidently goes back to a bill before the last year's bill.

Mr. DYER. If the gentleman from Texas will permit, I will say that there was some amendment offered from the floor to increase the district attorney's salary, and that probably is what confuses the mind of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BURLESON. But that is not the issue here.

Mr. FOWLER. I can not recall, Mr. Chairman, of course, every item in the bill, but I do recollect the fact of some man standing here on the floor of the House and making a point of order against an effort—whether by amendment or whether it was in the bill as it came from the hands of the committee I can not recall—but it was sought to increase the salary of the District attorney from $4,500 to $5,000, and I still recall that whenever there was an amendment offered to increase the salary of a laboring man, such as those who scrub the streets around the markets of this city at a salary of $240 a year, that the committee, or some member thereof, stood on the floor of this House and made a point of order against every attempt to increase the salary of the laboring man of this District.

Mr. BURLESON. Just as we made the point of order to the amendment seeking to increase the salary of the corporation counsel.

Mr. FOWLER. I made that point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to direct myself to the consideration of the item against which my colleague [Mr. FOWLER] has reserved the point of order. Recommendation has been made by the committee to increase the salary of the computer from whatever he is receiving now to $1,800. This computer is a civil engineer. The volume of building being done throughout the District is growing greater every day, and the character of the construction of the buildings is much superior to what it used to be. Different classes of material are being used in the construction of buildings now, and many of the buildings are being constructed wholly of steel, so far as the interior goes.

The man who occupies this place, whoever he may be—and I do not know who he is—must be able to figure the tensile strength of all materials entering into the construction of a building. He must have the scientific knowledge on which to base a recommendation for the issuance of a permit which will enable those who issue the permit to be certain that the material used has the strength to carry the load which is to be placed upon it. This position is one requiring the highest class of scientific engineering knowledge, and the sum of $1,800 a year is inadequate to compensate such a man for the service which he is required to render.

Mr. BUTLER. One can not get it for $1,800, can he?

Mr. MADDEN. There is no city in the Union with a population equal to that of Washington whose building department is run anywhere nearly so economically as the building department in this city. I think it would be much better for the people who live in the District and for the safety of the people who are engaged in the construction of buildings to have many more technical men employed, to see that all the material entering into the construction of buildings is of the character that will insure safety. I surely hope that my colleague will not insist upon a point of order against the recommendation for the increase of a salary of a man required to know what a man who occupies this place must know. The construction of buildings is an important factor in the life of a community. To see that they are properly constructed is one of the most essential elements in the conduct of this department. The man who is a computer must not only know how to figure tensile strength of steel girders and of every other article of material entering into a building, but he must be able to ascertain whether all the sanitary appliances necessary are being provided. This is an important task. We ought not to consider it too lightly. We ought to be willing to pay men who are qualified to do this important task just compensation, and because some man who occupies a more menial position, forsooth, may not be getting all that some Member thinks he ought to get for the work he does, is not a good argument against the payment of proper compensation to the man who needs this scientific knowledge in order to perform his work.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, in order that there may be no doubt about the action taken by the committee last year, I have here the bill that was reported to the House, and one of the items is:

Corporation counsel, $4,500.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on his point of order?

Mr. FOWLER. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting after the word "computers" the words and figures "one, $1,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 5, by inserting at the beginning of the line: "One, $1,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To reimburse two elevator inspectors for the provision and maintenance by themselves of two motor cycles for use in their official inspection of elevators in the District of Columbia, $10 per month each, $240.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph, because it is not authorized by existing law. It is another means of paying a private claim, which is not in order on this bill. I refer the Chair to the authorities which I found and laid on his desk a moment ago.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I contend that this is not subject to a point of order. By this item it is intended to reimburse two employees of the Government for expenditures made by them by reason of using an implement or machine that is necessary to be used in the discharge of their official duties.

Mr. COX. Who buys the motor cycles in the first instance—the District or the employee?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The employee.

Mr. BURLESON. I do not know. In some services the employee buys them and in some the District owns the machines. I do not know whether in this particular case the motor is furnished by the employee or is owned by the District.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The hearings show that they are privately owned.

Mr. BURLESON. I am just now informed that in this particular case the employees own their own motor cycles.

Mr. DYER. And this is furnished upon the same theory that car tickets are furnished to inspectors.

Mr. BURLESON. Exactly; and this fund is necessary to be used in the discharge of duties imposed upon them by the office they hold, just as certain employees are paid $20 a month for the keep of a horse; just as street-car tickets are furnished to certain employees whose duties call upon them to use the street car service.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman why did the committee reduce the amount from $15 to $10 a month?

Mr. BURLESON. You mean reduce the estimate?

Mr. MANN. These inspectors are now paid at the rate of $15 for expenses of maintaining motor cycles. Why was it reduced to $10?

Mr. BURLESON. We did it after making inquiry of a number of the merchants in the city who are engaged in selling motor cycles. Anxious to protect the Treasury, we made an investigation to ascertain whether we were paying too much, and we reached the conclusion that $10 per month was ample to cover this service, and therefore we reduced it from $15 to $10.

Mr. COX. In that connection will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Has this amount been turned over in a lump sum to these owners of these motor cycles heretofore?

Mr. BURLESON. They are paid each month $10 to cover expenses which they incur.

Mr. COX. Whether the expense has actually taken place, so far as the repair of these motor cycles is concerned or not?

Mr. BURLESON. There may be more expense incurred during one month than $10 would cover, and the next month it may be less. As I have just stated, we made inquiry of half a dozen merchants who are engaged in selling these motor cycles, with a view of ascertaining what would be a fair cost per month for this service, and we reached the conclusion, based on what they told us, that $15 was too much, and we reduced it to $10. We think $10 per month is a fair allowance for this service.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield at that point? The gentleman did not have before him any of the owners of the motor cycles with a view of eliciting from them the information as to how much the upkeep of the motor cycles actually did cost them?

Mr. BURLESON. No; we tried to secure our information from unbiased sources and we adopted the means at hand in order to secure unbiased opinions, and therefore we made inquiry of those who are engaged in the sale of motor cycles, and not from those who are operating them.

Mr. COX. And they estimated $10?

Mr. BURLESON. The merchants stated to us that $10 was a fair allowance for the service.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. We called up various motor-cycle owners and others in regard to the subject, we had a very careful investigation of this matter, and after thoroughly considering it we thought we could reduce it to $10——

Mr. COX. Was there any objection coming from the owners of the motor cycles in regard to the reduction in any way?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Coming from the owners we proposed to compensate, we have not consulted them, but we found it was a fair, liberal rental.

Mr. COX. Did you hear of any protest on their part?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. We have not heard anything.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, it is admitted that these machines are owned by individuals and not by the District. The language itself shows that it is a contemplated reimbursement to an individual to cover the expense of caring for his private property, and I insist that by that it becomes a private claim, and when it becomes a private claim it is subject to the point of order, according to the authority which I just laid before the Chairman—the fourth volume of Hinds' Precedents.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: Insert in the place where the language was stricken out the following:

To two elevator inspectors, for the provision and maintenance by themselves of two motor cycles for use in their official inspection of elevators in the District of Columbia, $10 per month each, $240.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Oh, Mr. Chairman, that is just the same thing. I make the point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, by inserting in the place of the paragraph stricken out:

"To two elevator inspectors, for the provision and maintenance by themselves of two motor cycles for use in their official inspection of elevators in the District of Columbia, $10 per month each, $240."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is a distinction without a difference, Mr. Chairman. I have made the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address myself to the point of order. When a policy is established to be carried out, or discharged by a department, or bureau head, or their equivalent, it is entirely competent to appropriate for the agents required to carry out the policy, and for the instrumentalities that promote the efficiency of the agents.

In conformity with this principle we appropriate for the maintenance of the horses of the mounted police, though as I understand these horses are owned by the policemen. This appropriation provides for the maintenance of an instrumentality highly promotive of an efficient discharge of duty by these officials. In a word it greatly increases their efficiency, and in effect renders an increase of their number unnecessary. It is in the interest of economy to make this appropriation. This is not a claim. These men are making none. The amendment makes a direct appropriation to pay for the upkeep of motor cycles, just as we might provide these officials with riding horses, or car tickets, or horse-propelled vehicles in order to increase their efficiency, by providing them with means of rapid transit. These instrumentalities multiply the efficiency of these particular officials, and it is entirely competent for this committee to provide for their maintenance. In this connection, I can submit to the Chair, if it is desired, abundant authority to establish that when authority is given to create an official, and to give him a salary, an appropriation may be made to pay for his transportation necessarily incurred in the discharge of his duties. If the official owns the instrumentality as the officials in this instance, happen to do, it is competent for us to provide for their upkeep, just as we might appropriate for the car fare of certain employees, when in the course of duty, it is necessary to use the cars. No question of reimbursement is presented in this amendment. We are primarily and directly providing for the maintenance of the motor cycles of these particular officials, who have frequent occasion to use them in the line of duty.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I thought the point of order had been sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. No ruling has been made by the Chair on the amendment as proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, as to the amendment, it is just the same thing as the original clause, except it is couched in a little different language. The purpose and object is just the same and the end is just the same.

The CHAIRMAN. The original amendment to reimburse elevator inspectors is subject to the infirmity, as viewed parliamentarily, as an appropriation for a private claim. The original amendment recited that it was to reimburse for the upkeep, as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, as the private instrumentality of travel of the employee. Now the gentleman moves an amendment which is to allow a certain sum for elevator inspectors for repair of vehicles——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Would not that be an increase in their salary and be subject to a point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the subject.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules on the amendment as it is submitted in such a way as to construe the effect of it, as judged by the rule of parliamentary law, and the point of order to the amendment as last offered is accordingly overruled. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation, for means of transportation, and for maintenance of means of transportation, $1,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the item in that it is new legislation. And I might say in support of it that in the hearings, on page 25, line 30, this colloquy took place before the Committee on Appropriations:

Mr. BURLESON. This item on page 12 practically means the starting of a new item of appropriation which will be carried continuously?

Col. JUDSON. Yes, sir; that is what it means.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr Chairman, it is a new item—I do not deny that—but it is intended to defray the expenses of certain employees in the District government whose duties compel them, if they properly discharge them, to visit every section of this city. It is to defray the expenses of the building inspectors and the elevator inspectors. The latter are compelled, some of them, to visit all the public buildings, all the hotels, and all the office buildings, and they can not properly discharge their duties unless they go to these various places. The District government undertakes, in this item, to furnish them transportation in order that they may properly discharge the duties imposed upon them. The method of transportation may be by street car, motor car, horse and buggy, bicycle, or motor cycle, but the purpose of the appropriation is to facilitate and aid the employees of the government who are compelled to visit various parts of the city to properly and efficiently discharge their duties.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am quite familiar with the purpose of it, Mr. Chairman. That appears upon its face. But, nevertheless, it is new legislation.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I am at a loss to see how this point of order could be sustained. In the first place, here is a District government created by law. This is an appropriation to support that government, and we, as the common council, are considering the appropriation. Does the gentleman contend that if another building for the fire department was necessary, that would be a new appropriation? Is it a new appropriation, not authorized, to buy an additional fire engine? Here is a service; this is for transportation in the conduct of that service. It is a necessary incident, or it is an incident to the service. It may be that it is not necessary, but that is up to the Committee of the Whole and to the House to establish. But to say that it is not authorized by law is equivalent to saying that if you have been using towels heretofore you could not make an appropriation for sponges.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Plumbing inspection division: Inspector of plumbing, $2,000; principal assistant inspector of plumbing, $1,550; assistant inspectors of plumbing—1 at $1,200, 4 at $1,000 each; clerks—1 at $1,200, 1 at $900; temporary employment of additional assistant inspectors of plumbing and laborers for such time as their services may be necessary, $1,700; draftsman, $1,350; sewer tapper, $1,000; 3 members of the plumbing board, at $150 each.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether or not the members of this plumbing board receive any other salary than $150.

Mr. BURLESON. They receive additional compensation. The members of the board are employees of the District government, but as their duties as members of this board was an additional duty imposed upon them at the time the board was provided for, an estimate was submitted for paying its members, and after carefully considering the estimate it was thought that the service being rendered was worth the amount carried in the bill.

Mr. COX. How much other salary do they get?

Mr. BURLESON. I do not recall the salary that is otherwise paid to the various members of the board.

Mr. COX. How many of them are there?

Mr. BURLESON. There are three of them. These duties of the members of this board are discharged by them after office hours.

Mr. COX. That is the very point I wanted to inquire about.

Mr BURLESON. And for that reason we concluded that we could utilize the services of certain of the District employees and fairly compensate them for it, aiding them and at the same time saving expense to the District.

Mr. COX. Then they do not consume any time whatever in this work that should be devoted to their other duties? This is an extra duty which they perform, and this $150 payment to each is intended to be compensation for that extra duty?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; for the extra duty they perform after office hours.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Chairman, what are the duties of the plumbing board?

Mr. BURLESON. There are certain duties imposed by law upon this plumbing board; the statute was passed a few years ago. Persons who are desirous of engaging in business as plumbers in the District of Columbia are required by law to have certain qualifications, certain attainments, and this board passes upon the qualifications of those desiring to enter the trade before they are given a plumber's license.

Mr. COX. Do all the plumbers have to have a license?

Mr. BURLESON. As I understand it; yes.

Mr. COX. Then this is a board to examine the qualifications of plumbers in this District?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; they test the qualifications of those who are desirous of engaging in the plumbing business in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CALDER. It is a very necessary board. We have a similar board in my home city.

Mr. BURLESON. We have a similar board to examine those who wish to engage in steam engineering. Congress thought it was necessary to provide by law for the creation of this board, and acting in pursuance of that law the board was provided for, and we thought it more economical to employ those who were already in the District service, receiving compensation for labors they were performing at that time, as members of the board and compensate them for the additional service they rendered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, does this plumbing board fix the price for plumbing? [Laughter.]

Mr. BURLESON. Probably that duty ought to be imposed upon them, but up to the present time it has not been imposed upon them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RODDENBERY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 28499) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

S. 1072. An act to amend section 895 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia; and

S. J. Res. 158. Joint resolution approving the plan, design, and location for a Lincoln memorial.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 8279. An act to amend an act approved October 1, 1890, entitled "An act to set apart certain tracts of land in the State of California as forest reservations"; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WILDER, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for five days, on account of the death of his mother.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what the House will proceed with to-morrow, so far as the public business is concerned.

Mr. BURLESON. It is my purpose to try to continue the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman is not at all sure that we might not have an extra hour for other purposes wasted? The gentleman can get unanimous consent that we proceed with the consideration of this bill to-morrow.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, I will modify my request and ask unanimous consent that we proceed with the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill to-morrow immediately after the approval of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. Of course that is subject to conference reports and things like that.

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought perhaps they would again get up the immigration conference report to-morrow. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, and that after the reading of the Journal and such little matters of routine as ought to be attended to the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the District of Columbia bill.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURRAY. The Chair made a reference to such matters as conference reports. I should like to know whether the House may at this time make an arrangement which would give this matter precedence over such a matter as the conference report on the immigration bill?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the House can do that by unanimous consent, but there are no conference reports. There are always some little matters of routine, like personal requests and corrections of the Journal, and there might be some little matter of business that would not take a minute to attend to, that Members would want to present for immediate consideration.

Mr. MANN. That can be done by unanimous consent of the House to-morrow.

Mr. MURRAY. The Chair made reference to a possible conference report on the immigration bill.

The SPEAKER. That remark was intended to be facetious.

Mr. MURRAY. Oh.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Is an adjournment to 11 o'clock included as a part of the unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

EXPENSES OF THE INAUGURAL CEREMONIES.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 157, one of the inaugural resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which will be reported by the Clerk.

Senate joint resolution 157, to enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay the necessary expenses of the inaugural ceremonies of the President of the United States March 4, 1913, was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That to enable the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay the necessary expenses of the inaugural ceremonies of the President of the United States March 4, 1913, in accordance with such program as may be adopted by the joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, appointed under a concurrent resolution of the two Houses, including the pay for extra police for three days, at $3 per day, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, the same to be immediately available.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the consideration of the joint resolution, but I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall be glad to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. MANN. This appropriation, as I understand it, is, in part or in whole, to cover the expenses which may be incurred under the direction of the joint committee of the House and Senate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is to cover entirely the expenses to be incurred.

Mr. MANN. It covers those expenses, but it may cover some other things.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Stands and such things.

Mr. MANN. Stands and platforms out in front of the Capitol, and so forth?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. Four years ago, after the joint committee had provided a stand, the officials of the two Houses provided separate stands. I understand the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds has taken the matter up with the joint committee and objected to those stands because of the fire danger, and I understand that the joint committee have arranged to have a stand sufficiently large to provide the accommodations which would be given by these separate stands if they were erected.

Mr. MANN. That brings us to the real point of inquiry; how many tickets do we get?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee to make a statement and to be as liberal as he can. I do not think the gentleman from Illinois is particularly interested in it.

Mr. MANN. I am getting the information for the benefit of the House.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, it was decided by the joint committee to increase the size of the regular stand so that it would have a capacity as great as was had by the regular stand four years ago with the two extra stands that were built, one by the Senate and one by the House, in so far as that committee could control the situation. The Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds thought the erection of those special stands very objectionable on account of the danger of fire, and recommended this proposition which the committee now adopts. Now, as far as the number of tickets is concerned, I have to say to the gentleman from Illinois that that is still in abeyance.

Mr. MANN. I thought that possibly the committee had got far enough so that the gentleman could figure out how much space there will be. It will not be long before there ought to be an announcement to the House, because Members will be receiving requests for seats very soon.

Mr. GARRETT. The seating capacity of the stand that is recommended by the joint committee is 8,500. Of course, the gentleman understands that there will be something like 2,000 of these tickets taken up to accommodate those who have admission to the Senate floor.

Four and eight years ago each Member of the House received four tickets and each Member of the Senate received 12 tickets to the stand.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a great disproportion.

Mr. MANN. They had the same size stand that we had, but a smaller membership.

Mr. GARRETT. That was based upon the fact that they only had a membership of less than one-third of the House. There is a hope that the House may have some addition to that number, but I can not say positively.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have a great many applications for seats on the stand, but if the gentleman could make arrangements so that some of these applicants could remain here permanently during the next three or four years I think they would be willing to surrender their places on the stand. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT. I can say to the gentleman that it will certainly not be less than four tickets to each Member, and possibly more.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT.

And then, on motion of Mr. FITZGERALD (at 5 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.), the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 31, 1913, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an item of appropriation for the consideration of Congress in connection with the preparation of the sundry civil bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914 (H. Doc. No. 1314); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the president of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., submitting annual report of said company for the year 1912, to be substituted for report submitted January 13, 1913 (H. Doc. No. 1315); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of an appropriation for settlement of claims for damages to and loss of private property of citizens of the United States for the fiscal year 1914 (H. Doc. No. 1316); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of an appropriation for service of the fiscal year 1914 for repairs to the Government roadway to Vicksburg (Miss.) National Cemetery (H. Doc. No. 1317); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Washington Utilities Co., submitting report for the month of December and year 1912, and Washington-Virginia Railway Co. report for 11 months ended November 30, 1912 (H. Doc. No. 1318); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 19800) pensioning the surviving officers and enlisted men (or their widows), who served in the Indian wars of the western frontiers of the several States and Territories from the year 1865 to the year 1898, inclusive, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1417); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28469) granting two condemned cannon to the Wallkill Valley Cemetery Association, of Orange County, N. Y., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1421), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BULKLEY, from the Committee on Patents, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28286) to amend sections 4931 and 4934 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1423), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FITZGERALD, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 157) to enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay the necessary expenses of the inaugural ceremonies of the President of the United States on March 4, 1913, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1415), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SLAYDEN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 143) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents for use at the meeting of the Imperial Council of the Ancient Arabic Order of the Nobles of the Mystic Shrine to be held at Dallas, Tex., in May, 1913, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1416), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. WEBB, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 28335) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1418), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. ALEXANDER, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill (S. 1653) to provide American register for the steam yacht Diana, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1420), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. PRINCE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3873) for the relief of Lewis F. Walsh, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1419), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. STEPHENS of California: A bill (H. R. 28524) to create a board of local inspectors, Steamboat-Inspection Service, for the port of Los Angeles, Cal.; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 31, 1913.

(Continuation of legislative day of Thursday, January 30, 1913.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock and 45 minutes a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. GALLINGER). Senate joint resolution No. 78 is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois raises the question that there is no quorum present, and the roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cummins	Lodge	Sanders
Borah	Dillingham	McCumber	Shively
Brandegee	du Pont	McLean	Simmons
Bristow	Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.
Burnham	Gamble	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Burton	Gronna	Nelson	Smoot
Catron	Guggenheim	Newlands	Stephenson
Chamberlain	Heiskell	Oliver	Sutherland
Chilton	Hitchcock	Overman	Swanson
Clapp	Jackson	Page	Thomas
Clark, Wyo.	Johnston, Ala.	Perkins	Thornton
Crawford	Jones	Perky	Townsend
Culberson	Kenyon	Richardson	Wetmore
Cullom	La Follette	Root	Williams

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is absent on business. I should like to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia] is detained from the Chamber on account of sickness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. THORNTON. I wish at this time to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER] from the Chamber on account of illness in his family, and also to state that he is paired with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

SENATOR FROM IDAHO.

Mr. PERKY. I present the credentials of Hon. WILLIAM E. BORAH, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Idaho a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1913, and ask that they be read and filed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be read.

The credentials of WILLIAM EDGAR BORAH, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Idaho a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1913, were read and ordered to be filed.

INDEPENDENCE OF THE JUDICIARY (S. DOC. NO. 1032).

Mr. McCUMBER. With the permission of the Senate I send to the Chair an address delivered to the graduating class of the Yale Law School, June 17, 1912, by William B. Hornblower, of New York. It is a very important address, and I ask that it be printed as a public document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

PROPOSED INTRODUCTION OF A BILL.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask leave out of order to introduce a bill to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection, but——

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order that under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senate can not engage in any other business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts objects on the ground that under the unanimous-consent agreement the bill can not be received. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 157) to enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay the necessary expenses of the inaugural ceremonies of the President of the United States on March 4, 1913.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 28186) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 1072. An act to amend section 895 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia;

H. R. 18841. An act incorporating the National Institute of Arts and Letters;

H. R. 24104. An act to create a new division of the western judicial district of Texas and to provide for terms of court at Pecos, Tex., and for other purposes; and

S. J. Res. 158. Joint resolution approving the plan, design, and location for a Lincoln memorial.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolutions:

On January 29, 1913:

S. J. Res. 145. Joint resolution to provide for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property in connection with the presidential inaugural ceremonies in 1913.

On January 30, 1913:

S. 2666. An act granting an increase of pension to William P. Clark; and

S. 6380. An act to incorporate the American Hospital of Paris.

On January 31, 1913:

S. J. Res. 153. Joint resolution granting to the Fifth Regiment Maryland National Guard the use of the corridors of the courthouse of the District of Columbia upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the marshal of the District of Columbia.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 28186. An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BRISTOW. What is the pending amendment, may I inquire?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No amendment is pending.

Mr. BRISTOW. Was the amendment which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] offered voted on yesterday?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi withdrew his amendment temporarily.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is an amendment pending, I think. I offered one yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota submitted an amendment to be printed. Does the Senator offer it now?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. I offer the amendment which I submitted yesterday and which has been printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York offers an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, lines 8 and 9, in the amendment of the committee, strike out the words "under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof" and insert in lieu thereof the words:

> The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of the President shall be six years; and no person who has held the office by election, or discharged its powers or duties, or acted as President after the 4th day of March, 1917, shall be eligible to again hold the office by election.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to see that amendment just one moment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is on the Senator's desk.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose the intention of the Senator from New York is not to let it be retroactive.

Mr. ROOT. Precisely. It relieves——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think if the Senator will watch this language he will see that it is subject to a possible misconstruction:

> And no person who has held the office by election, or discharged its powers or duties, or acted as President after the 4th day of March, 1917, shall be eligible to again hold the office by election.

Does not the Senator mean to say that no person who has held the office by election or discharged its powers or duties or acted as President shall be eligible after the 4th day of March, 1917?

Mr. ROOT. It is intended to require that the cause of ineligibility shall be the holding of the office or the acting as President after the 4th of March, 1917, so that no one will be made ineligible before.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If that is the intention, it is all right.

Mr. ROOT. The idea is that no previous election or acting as President shall disqualify anyone. That really will not take effect in any sense or degree until after the expiration of President Wilson's term.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It would operate in this way if that is your intention. Mr. Wilson, for example, comes in now, and he would serve until 1917.

Mr. ROOT. He would not be ineligible.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He would not be eligible any more.

Mr. ROOT. He would not be ineligible. He would be eligible.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I meant to say "ineligible."

Mr. ROOT. And Mr. Taft would be eligible and Mr. Roosevelt would be eligible.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I meant to say he would not be ineligible. Then it might happen that Mr. Wilson could occupy the presidential office for three terms.

Mr. ROOT. No; one afterwards and one before.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; that is right; one six-year term afterwards and one term of four years.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the Senator from New York takes his seat I should like to ask him what possible reason there is for disqualifying for election to the Presidency a Vice President or a Cabinet officer who may be exercising the powers of President and duties of the office for, say, six months?

It seems to me that the purpose of this proposed amendment to the Constitution is to give a term of six years to a President and then to prohibit him from running for reelection. But the use of the language in the committee amendment and the language of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York includes a prohibition against the Vice President who has temporarily filled the office or a Cabinet officer who has temporarily filled the office from running for President, whereas the situation might be such that he would be preeminently the choice of the people and he might have held the office for only a few months. I should like to ask the Senator from New York whether the following amendment, which I propose to offer and which has been printed, does not fully meet the needs and avoid all possible ambiguities such as the Senator from Mississippi has raised. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to read my amendment for his consideration in connection with his own.

> The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of President shall be six years, and no person elected for six years after the adoption of this amendment shall be eligible again to hold the office by election.

That excludes any man elected to the office. It does not exclude a man who has held it temporarily for a short time and does not apply to President-elect Wilson.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. I wish to say, if the Senator from Idaho will excuse me for a moment, in regard to the observation just made by the Senator from Nebraska that I am inclined to agree with him. I should prefer the amendment in a simple form, not undertaking to take in all the accidental and temporary holders of the Presidency, but this amendment was not designed to touch that. It was addressed solely to the single proposition that whatever amendment we adopt ought to be postponed in its effect, so that it will have no possible personal interest urging toward its adoption or its defeat.

I understand the adoption of this amendment, postponing the operation until after the 4th of March, 1917, will not at all interfere with another amendment which deals with the subject the Senator from Nebraska has just referred to.

Let me hasten, Mr. President, while I am up to say that in copying the provision the old split infinitive has crept in again. The copy was made from the print before it was corrected, and the words "again" and "to" should be transposed in line 6. That shows the persistency of evil.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the amendment which is offered by the Senator from New York, I understand, would not exclude from reelection the President elect.

Mr. ROOT. It would not.

Mr. BORAH. And it would not exclude from reelection the ex-President.

Mr. ROOT. It would not.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that discloses the weakness of this whole proposition. We are willing to except from the rule the President, the President elect, and the ex-President. Those who are opposed to this resolution believe that in the future it may be considered wise to except from the rule some living ex-President or President. If this is a good rule in the future, it is a good rule now. It can not be said that it is a reflection upon any man, when we are adopting an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to make it apply to all citizens alike.

I do not think that I would be as anxious as some Senators here to exclude the ex-President from reelection, but if we are going to amend the Constitution I am sure it should be made to apply to all alike.

Now, if we of this generation think it wise to say that there are some men who are sufficiently virtuous and sufficiently patriotic and sufficiently able to be reelected, may we not leave this question to future generations to determine the same thing?

So I think, Mr. President, that in the effort to get around the present situation we reveal the real weakness of this movement, and I am opposed to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. ROOT. I ask for a roll call.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask whether the amendment of the Senator from New York is open to amendment or if his amendment should be adopted whether my amendment would have to be offered as a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that the amendment itself is open to amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The amendment of the Senator from New York?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is open to amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. May I, then, propose mine as a substitute, and first secure a vote upon that?

Mr. ROOT. My amendment is an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from New York is an amendment to the committee amendment, and the amendment itself can be amended.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I inquire in what order the amendments are being offered to the committee amendment? Are they offered in the order in which they were presented, or are they called up at the pleasure of a Senator addressing the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no authority to place the amendments before the Senate, and they will be considered as Senators proposing them shall call them up.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I rose to ascertain the order in which they should be presented for the purpose of withdrawing the amendment which I proposed. I see that the Senator from New York has covered that ground so much better than I did, so much more compactly and so much more clearly, that I wish permission to withdraw the amendment I offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas can withdraw his amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If it would be proper, then, I offer my amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted by the Senator from New York insert the following:

> The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of President shall be six years, and no person elected for six years after the adoption of this amendment shall be eligible again to hold the office by election.

Mr. BRISTOW. If I understand that amendment properly, a President might die within a month after he was inaugurated and the Vice President succeed him and serve for 5 years and 11 months, and then he would be eligible for election 6 years longer, placing him continuously in office practically for 12 years.

Mr. BORAH. That is correct.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not think I want any proposition of that kind.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, that is a possibility, but it seems to me that the alternative presents a greater evil. We propose by the language contained in the committee amendment and by the language contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from New York to disqualify a Vice President or possibly a Cabinet officer, who may have served only a month, from being elected President of the United States. I do not think that such a proscription is contemplated.

The real purpose of the proposed amendment to the Constitution, confining the President to one term and the length of that term to six years, may be said to be two-fold. In the first place, the public sentiment in favor of a single term had its origin in the desire to avoid frequent elections. It was considered that an election of a President every four years tended to keep the country in an almost continuous state of political uproar, to the disturbance of business and to the unsettling of commerce and the industries of the country. The first proposition was to have a President elected every six years instead of every four years. Later, under the development of the presidential power, there has grown a sentiment in this country that no President should be reelected, for the reason that the centering of such a tremendous power in the Executive office is so without any parallel in the country that that great power should not be twice intrusted to the same man.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator from Nebraska what is the object of making this exception as to a man who has been elected once for the six-year term? Why not have the constitutional provision apply as soon as the States shall have ratified it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So as to apply to the President elect and to ex-President Roosevelt and to President Taft? Does the Senator make that inquiry? The objection that has been stated is that it is unjust to adopt an amendment that seems to point to any particular individual, which seems to disqualify ex-President Roosevelt or President Taft, who has only held one term, or President Elect Wilson, who will have held one term at the expiration of the approaching term.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. ROOT. I wish to say that the amendment, which is really a substitute, offered by the Senator from Nebraska, accomplishes the purpose I had in mind equally well with the amendment which I offered. I should be entirely satisfied if the amendment suggested by the Senator from Nebraska be adopted. I say this now because I am obliged to leave the Chamber for the purpose of taking a train. I shall be paired, but I shall be silent. I wish to say that I am perfectly satisfied with the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska. It accomplishes the purpose I had in view.

Mr. BORAH. Before the Senator leaves to take the train, may I ask why it is necessary to except anyone from the provision of a constitutional amendment?

Mr. ROOT. Because, Mr. President, in making an amendment to the Constitution of the United States we ought to deal impersonally for the general interests of the Government of the United States, and we ought to exclude from consideration all personal elements. That was the idea in prohibiting this amendment from applying to any of the men who are now in the active political field by reason of their previous election to the Presidency of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. It occurs to me that when we except three persons we make it personal, but when we make a universal rule it applies to all alike and can not be personal. There are three distinguished gentlemen occupying a place as political leaders, and you designate and single them out. You might just as well insert their names in this amendment and make it personal. You are amending the Constitution and making an exception to these three distinguished men in American politics.

Mr. ROOT. I will leave the Senator's argument with simply calling attention to the fact that the Senator is avowedly desirous to defeat the whole proposition.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from New York is correct again.

Mr. PAYNTER. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One amendment to that amendment is now pending, and it would not be in order to offer another at the present time.

Mr. PAYNTER. I may be permitted to suggest that we ought to amend it further. Under the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska the joint resolution would not take effect for 10 years practically, because the incoming President will hold for 4 years and it provides that after a man has been elected President for 6 years he shall be ineligible. I think an amendment should be made to put in operation this constitutional provision two years earlier than it would go into effect under the amendment suggested by the Senator from Nebraska. I would suggest that the words "nineteen hundred and seventeen" be stricken out of the amendment offered by the Senator from New York and "nineteen hundred and twenty-one" inserted in lieu of it, so that at the end of 8 years it would take effect instead of 10 years.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska will be adopted. As the joint resolution was first introduced by me it provided in very simple terms for one term for the President and Vice President of the United States. There was no particular reason why the limitation should be applied to the Vice President of the United States except to put them upon a uniform basis. There was, on the other hand, no reason why the rule should not be applied to the Vice President as well as to the President.

The joint resolution went into the Judiciary Committee. They have so changed it that if the Vice President of the United States should assume the office for one day, or the Secretary of State, under the rule of succession provided by statute, should serve for any length of time, either of them would be absolutely disqualified to become a candidate for President. I think, Mr. President, that is unjust. I do not think this joint resolution ought to go to that extent. I am very strongly in favor of limiting the holding of the office by the President of the United States to one term of six years. I have endeavored, in a speech of some length that I made here some time ago, to give my reasons for the convictions that I entertain; but my ideas do not go so far as that of the Judiciary Committee in the particulars that I have suggested, and I should be very glad if everything might be eliminated from this joint resolution except the simple question of limiting the tenure of the President to one term and disqualifying him thereafter.

I understand that a case might arise where the Vice President might succeed to the office of President very soon after the term for which the President had been elected, but that will occur very infrequently; it has done so in the past. So I think it will be much better to leave that situation as it is than to place this limitation upon any citizen of this country who has held the office for so brief a time as might occur—taking the other side of the situation.

With respect to the other question, whether this provision ought to be made to apply to citizens of this country who have already held the office of President of the United States, I will say that personaliy, so far as the principle involved is concerned, I should prefer to have it take effect absolutely and apply to everybody; but we can not conceal from ourselves the fact that there has intervened in this case a question of personality. It is perfectly evident to every Senator on this floor that Senators are being influenced more or less by that consideration of personality. I should be glad to see that phase of it eliminated; and in order to do that, in order that we may come to this question as a mere principle—and it is a great fundamental principle—I shall be perfectly willing to have these gentlemen excepted from the provisions of the joint resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if these gentlemen are excepted, they ought to be excepted during their entire natural life.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am not willing to allow the Senator from Idaho to misrepresent my position. I am not saying that it ought to be done. Personally, I would much rather it were not done; but in order to eliminate that phase of it, for one I am willing to waive my convictions in respect to it; the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is not, because his whole purpose in the matter is to defeat this joint resolution and to get everything possible into it to bring about that result on the final vote.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho has been laboring industriously to get everything out of the joint resolution instead of getting everything into it. I have offered no amendment to it, and I do not propose to do so. I do not see how the joint resolution could be amended so as to make it any better than it was—for defeat. I am thoroughly opposed to the proposed amendment to the Constitution. That is pretty well understood. I may be in error, but I have not yet heard any argument that convinces me that I am. I do think, however, that the amendment ought not to be framed here upon the basis of some man's individual ambition to be President.

Mr. WORKS. I think so, too, Mr. President, and if that were the sole question involved, if there were nothing outside of it except the simple question of excepting these three gentlemen from the effect of the joint resolution, I should be opposed to it; but the fear I have in mind is that by reason of that very fact we are going to lose the vital issue that is presented in this case. That is precisely why the Senator from Idaho would be glad to have the joint resolution in that situation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not assume for a moment that the Senator from California introduced this joint resolution in the first instance by reason of the aspiration of a certain individual now in American politics to be President a third time. I do not assume that those who are urging it were urging it for that reason, yet I think that anyone who scans the situation will realize that the joint resolution would have had no considerable support at this time had it not been for that fact. There have been only three times when this matter has been very much discussed among the American people. They were during Gen. Jackson's administration; at the time Gen. Grant's name was mentioned in connection with a third term; and at the time Col. Roosevelt was mentioned in connection with a third term.

Since the Senator from California seems to assume that certain Senators are actuated because of personal relations, more or less strong with these men, I must be permitted to say that, in my judgment, the only real foundation for this joint resolution, the beginning of it, grew out of our situation at the present time. I am quite aware that there are individuals supporting it who support it for an entirely different reason; but so far as any sustained interest in it is concerned, so far as any general support is concerned, it comes by reason of the fact that Col. Roosevelt's name was mentioned in connection with a third term.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. PAYNTER. In view of the statement of the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] as to the personal aspect of the case, I want to say that when I suggested "twenty-one" instead of "seventeen," as provided in the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], I felt that it would be very well for it to take effect at the end of eight years. I think the joint resolution which is pending, as reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, is too indefinite; that it would have to be determined in some way whether or not the incoming President would hold for four years or for six years, and I should infinitely prefer to see a designation of four years rather than to leave the question open.

In addition to that, I want to say that under my construction of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and approved by the Senator from New York, the incoming President could be reelected at the end of four years; he then could be reelected under that language for six years, and thus could be President for 10 years. I am not influenced by political or personal considerations in this matter. I should infinitely prefer to see the term limited to four years than to make it possible for one man to hold for 10 years. Therefore I am very much opposed to the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Nebraska and accepted by the Senator from New York.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I certainly had no intention of intimating that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER] was influenced by any such motives as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] seems to think some others may be influenced by. I think it is placing a very low estimate upon Members of the Senate to say that any Member of this body would be influenced to vote one way or the other upon a great question like this on account of his personal friendship to any individual, and I am quite sure that no such feeling exists on the part of any Member of this body.

Mr. President, I do not feel that I would be justified in taking up the time of the Senate in discussing this question generally, because I have heretofore consumed a good deal of the time of the Senate in giving my views upon it. I only arose for the purpose of speaking directly to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], because it comports with my ideas on the subject from the beginning, with the single exception of placing this limitation upon it in view of the personal equation that has entered into this discussion.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota, and yield the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] has just stated that he did not consider and he thought no other Senator considered for a moment that the personal equation enters into this matter. It seems to me that the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] constitute a reflection upon the Senate itself. In effect they say to the country that a great principle—for it is a great principle—can not pass this body unless the adherents of three partisan leaders are recognized and the partisan leaders themselves are cared for in this proposed constitutional amendment.

I am not in favor of placing a limitation upon the right of the American people to elect as President whomsoever they please. I think one instance in our country's history shows how dangerous such a limitation might be; but if we place this limitation upon the people and upon ourselves it can only be justified upon the ground that the principle itself is a correct principle.

It seems to me, Mr. President, if I may use the expression without objection in this body, that it is almost trifling with a great fundamental principle that we should recognize a personal equation and exempt three gentlemen from a proposed constitutional amendment. One of those men I hold in close friendship, and yet as a friend of that man I would dislike to see this amendment to the joint resolution adopted. If it is wise for the American people to place this limitation upon themselves, it is unwise to except my friend or any other Senator's friend from the operation of this limitation.

Let us treat this matter squarely and fairly upon its merits. I do not believe in the limitation; but if it be wise to impose this limitation, let us rise to the occasion and impose it as against each and every individual whether or not he may have been President in the past.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I quite agree with what the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] has said with reference to this proposed constitutional amendment. I am supporting it because I believe it is a wholesome principle to put into the Constitution of the United States. I am not supporting it because its effect may be to eliminate any particular individual or individuals from further consideration for the presidential office. I am anxious that this joint resolution should be adopted and submitted to the American people; I am further anxious that the proposed constitutional amendment should be adopted by the people; and I shall support the amendment suggested by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], not because I believe that it would not be better to have the provision go into the Constitution without this exception, but because I believe that it will stand a far better chance of being adopted with the amendment than without it.

We have already heard from individuals that this was an attempt not to put some fundamental principle into the Constitution, but an attempt to preclude certain individuals from being renominated and reelected to the Presidency. If we do not put this amendment into the joint resolution we shall hear much of that claim while the amendment is pending before the several States. It will be urged in many States that this is simply an attempt to prevent this man or that man who has heretofore been President of the United States from being reelected, and the fundamental character of the principle will be to a very large extent lost sight of in that personal application of it. I intend to support the proposed amendment for that reason—to eliminate that particular element from consideration when the amendment is to be considered by the legislatures of the various States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he does not believe that, if this principle is meritorious, it ought to apply to the individuals whom the Senator has in mind? The Senator has said that he has heard objections made to one of the men referred to again holding the office of President. Those objections were more or less based upon the fact that he had served two terms. If there is any——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just let me complete my statement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator has not quoted me quite accurately.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If there is merit in the proposition to prevent a man from holding a third term or a second term, why should it not apply in one case as well as in any other case? Why should any man be excepted?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have endeavored to make my position clear, Mr. President. I think it should apply; I think it would be far better if there were no exceptions made at all; and I attempted to make that clear. What I have said is that it has already been claimed that the whole object of this proposed constitutional amendment was to exclude from future consideration some particular individual, and I fear that that same claim will be made when the amendment is submitted to the legislatures of the various States. So I propose by my vote to take out of the question that particular thing, if I can.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In that event——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. So that—if the Senator will permit me to finish—the question may be determined by the American people wholly from an impersonal standpoint. Let them pass upon the great fundamental principle that is involved, stripped of these personal considerations entirely, and I am willing to forego my objection to the exceptions—for I have objections to them—for the sake of the larger question which is involved.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the effect of that would be that the entire virtue of this amendment, so far as the present time is concerned and so far as current issues in this country are concerned, would be destroyed. The joint resolution would be emasculated so that it would have no effect upon existing conditions, which conditions are said to be dangerous and said to be the very conditions which are intended to be saved and remedied by this proposed amendment to the Constitution, and the joint resolution would be left valueless and without force as to the present time and never to be of any benefit to the American people, except upon some future contingency that might never occur.

It is said that there is now danger of a man perpetuating himself in office because of his ambition and his popularity with the people and because of the power and prestige that he has gained from having held the presidential office for two terms. If there is such a danger, that is the danger that the American people are concerned with far more than with some unknown danger in the future years that may never occur. If the amendment is of importance, it is of importance to meet the condition which confronts the people to-day, and if you strike it out, if you adopt this proposed amendment to the joint resolution, it may never have any effect.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Constitution or an amendment to the Constitution is not a transitory or a temporary thing; it is to endure for all time; and for the sake of obtaining a fundamental principle of this kind, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to forego the temporary inconvenience that may result, if any such does result, from an exception of this character for the sake of the future.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. PAYNTER. I understood the Senator from Utah to say that he favored the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I did.

Mr. PAYNTER. In connection with that, the Senator from New York said that he would accept the amendment, or that he favored the amendment, of the Senator from Nebraska. Now, I desire to call the Senator's attention to that fact.

This is the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska:

> The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of President shall be six years, and no person elected for six years after the adoption of this amendment shall be eligible again to hold the office by election.

If my interpretation of this amendment is correct, President Elect Wilson would be eligible under it to be reelected for six years. Do I understand the Senator to mean that he would be in favor of this presidential term, or two terms aggregating 10 years?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No, Mr. President. I have distinctly said that I was in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. If I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, I am not in favor of that amendment.

Mr. PAYNTER. I simply want the Senator to make himself perfectly understood in regard to it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The amendment that I favor is the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York and not the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think there is some misunderstanding with regard to the attitude at least of some of us who are in favor of this resolution. I am for the resolution, because I believe a President of the United States who is ineligible for reelection will be a better President than though he were eligible for reelection. I am not so much concerned about the fear of permanency in office.

The view of the Senator from Washington, it seems to me, is wholly inadmissible. There is a reason—not a fanciful reason, not a personal reason—why every ex-President could be exempted from the operation of this provision. Indeed, in principle he ought to be exempted. The amendment is intended to make a better President and a more faithful and more efficient performance of duty.

Referring to the distinguished ex-President of the United States, nothing that we can do will add to or take away from the efficiency of his work during the time he was President of the United States. That has gone. If he should be again President of the United States, it would be his efficiency during that term that would most concern the American people.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will not interrupt the Senator further than for one very brief remark.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Would you not be destroying the principal value of the amendment if you made these exceptions, in that you would destroy the precedent that a President shall not hold office for more than two terms, which has been established by custom in this country?

It is true, as the Senator from Iowa says, that it is too late now to affect the administration which is past and gone. But viewing the question from the standpoint of the Senator from Iowa, the breaking down of the precedent, by allowing a man who has already served two terms to serve another term, would open the way to affect the administrations which are to come in the future.

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not break down the principle. The principle involved is to take away from a President the temptation to depart from the path of his duty, the temptation to execute the laws with fear or with favor, instead of without fear and without favor. At least, that is the principal object that I seek to accomplish by my support of the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, I want to make this suggestion: Does not the Senator think the general principle that legislation should not be retroactive applies to this case as well as to others? Instead of its being an exception, it is merely fixing a date at which a provision intended to control the future destiny of the country shall take effect.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It would be a violation of principle to make it retroactive.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it is exactly in accord with the principle of all legislation. What we want to do is to affect for the better, if we can, the conduct of Presidents in the future, by taking away from them the motive that with some people is persuasive and overpowering, to discharge the duties of the presidential office in such a way as to conduce to a renomination and a reelection. Therefore the ex-President ought not to be reached by its provisions; and the present Executive, who will be an ex-President in a very few days, ought not to be reached by its provisions.

The incoming President would not fall within the category of the ex-President. But there is no probability that this amendment will receive the concurrence of three-fourths of the States for a year or two or three years, until practically the end of the term upon which he is about to enter. Therefore, substantially, he falls into the class of ex-Presidents, and should not be excluded by the principle of this proposed amendment to the Constitution.

I do not think the matter is very important; but it has been made an issue, and the motives of a good many of us who have advocated the resolution have been assailed. It has been asserted that it is our purpose to exclude certain persons from again holding office. I am so earnestly in favor of the principle itself, and I so earnestly hope that the resolution will finally become a part of the Constitution, that I desire to remove every possible objection that can be urged to it that will not impair the value of the change itself.

I am not quite agreed with the Senator from Nebraska with regard to the other part of his amendment. As I said in the Committee on the Judiciary, I would be willing to agree to make it applicable to the Vice President, or to those who come in by succession under the laws of Congress passed in pursuance of the Constitution, only in the event that the Vice President held for a certain substantial time the office of President. If the Vice President came in during the very closing days of a presidential term, I think it would be very unfair to exclude him or render him ineligible ever again to hold the office. If the Secretary of State should come in and hold the office for 30 days, just long enough to call Congress together so that it might order another election, I think it would be unfair to exclude him from the chance of being elected to this high office.

Therefore I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that if he were to change his amendment so as to exclude these people only in the event that they held the office a certain and substantial length of time, he would very greatly strengthen it in its passage.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not see that the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska differs from that of the Senator from New York on the material point. If we are going to exempt these three gentlemen from the operation of this constitutional amendment, it stands to reason that Mr. Wilson will be able to hold the office continuously for 10 years. It does not make any difference how you bring it about; but if you do not allow the 7 years of Mr. Roosevelt and the 4 years of Mr. Taft and the 4 years of Mr. Wilson to count against them, Mr. Wilson will be in a position where he can have the Presidency, if he can get renominated and reelected, for 10 consecutive years.

It seems to me it is a contradiction of all that this resolution seeks to accomplish to start it with a provision of that kind. If the principle is worth anything, surely it is a principle that ought to be applied without embodying in the Constitution a temporary personality.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I differ with the Senator from Massachusetts in this respect: The essential thing that is aimed at is not to fix any particular number of years after which the President shall be ineligible for reelection. The principle is one altogether independent of a term of 4 years, or 6 years, or 8 years, or 10 years. The principle is to fix a definite termination to the present condition of the possibility of indefinite tenure, which might lead to perpetual tenure, or to life tenure.

If this resolution itself recited that the presidential term should be 10 years, and that after that time nobody should be reeligible, the principle would be saved. The principle would be saved, too, provided you fix a limit beyond which he shall not be reelected, beyond which it will be treason to the Republic to attempt to be reelected.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me the length of term is a very essential point.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think it is essential, too; but I mean it is a minor matter. The main thing is to make it impossible for a President indefinitely to succeed himself.

Mr. LODGE. But it does not seem to me that we ought to start with creating such an inequality that one man may have the Presidency for 13 years with a gap between, another may have it for 10 years with a gap between, another may have it for 10 consecutive years, and no other American citizen at any time is ever to hold it for more than 6 years. It seems to me, we start with an inequality if we attempt to do anything of that kind. If this principle is sound—I do not believe in it myself—it ought to be equally applied to all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this principle is equally applied to all. We are changing the Constitution. Under the Constitution now a man may be elected as long as he lives, provided he can get enough votes for each term. We are providing for a condition of things to begin upon a certain date, and after that date everybody will stand upon an absolute equality of footing. The fact that something may have happened prior to that time whereby one has enjoyed the presidential office for a longer term than another argues no inequality at all. The Senator from Massachusetts and I have never been President to-day, so far as that is concerned. One of these men has been President seven years, another has been President four years, and if some other ex-President were living he would have been President eight years. But as this is a law to take effect in the future, and as it is made for the future, it would be a violation of every principle of sound legislation to make it retroactive, so as to visit with a penalty a citizen of the United States who ought to stand upon an equality with all others, for no better reason than that in the past the people of the United States had honored him with the Presidency.

This is not legislation for the present; it is not legislation for the past; it is legislation for the future. All the equality you can demand is that after the law goes into operation it shall operate with absolute equality upon all citizens of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator states a correct principle, it seems to me; but this amendment changes that principle.

Mr. LODGE. It does.

Mr. BORAH. The principle the Senator states is one that is now embodied in the original resolution, and if it is ratified it will operate as against all persons. But the amendment which is offered excepts some three individuals from its operation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; it does. I think, upon reflection, the Senator will agree with me that it does, because there are only three individuals to whom the exception can possibly apply.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This resolution simply says that after a certain date nobody who is elected President for a term of six years shall be reeligible. It may be true that there will be three individuals in the United States who will stand upon a different footing from the balance of the people of the United States, owing to past service. But as far as the operation of this law is concerned, the amendment of the Senator from New York fixing a date at which it shall take effect, and it having no operation until that date, it bears upon all with absolute equality. It would be just as unfair to make this legislation retroactive—and the Constitution is nothing but fundamental and organic legislation—as it would to violate the principle in all other cases where you are legislating. It is generally admitted that except under very peculiar circumstances legislation ought not to be retroactive. On the contrary, if you do not adopt the amendment of the Senator from New York you will be making an exception against three men. You are saying that they shall be the only three people in the United States who after this law begins to go into operation shall not be operated upon equally by it. You are penalizing them for something that took place in the past before it became legislation.

Now, that is not all. One more word and I shall quit. It will be found that the men who are opposed to the main proposition—the general, fundamental proposition of putting an end to indefinite tenure in the presidential office—are also the men who are opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York. I am not questioning men's motives; I am just reciting now what might possibly be a motive. If a man wanted to defeat the general amendment, then he could not go about it in a better way than to array a very large part of the people of the United States against it, and, when it was being submitted to the States, to go to the poeple and say: "These people say in their high political manner that they were asserting a high fundamental principle, but they are after one man's scalp; they are persecuting this man. He received something over 2,000,000 votes from the American people, and they are trying now to render him ineligible to the Presidency." That would be done at once. Although it may not be the actual motive of those who are opposing the main proposition, it could possibly be the motive of anybody who wanted to defeat the main proposition.

Now, we are sensible men. If we are in favor of the main proposition, we want it ratified by the States. It will not be ratified if anybody can raise a persecution cry and say that it is directed at one particular man, and we who are in favor of the main proposition would be foolish to let it go out to the country handicapped in that manner.

Not only is it wrong that legislation should be retroactive, but it is unwise that those who want it passed should handicap themselves with active, aggressive antagonism on personal grounds of a great number of people; not the whole 2,000,000, of course, but a great share of them; as many of them as could be stirred up to look at the matter from that standpoint.

That is not all. They not only would say it, but it would be very hard to reply to it, because if the amendment of the Senator from New York is defeated now, after it had been explained that the purpose of it is to keep it from being directed personally at the ambition of this particular gentleman, who is the idol of a great many of the American people—if then it should be voted down and the proposition should be kept in its original condition, so that that particular man would be ineligible, there would be no answer, there would be no possible reply when they say that you singled him out and shot at him. You knew, or you thought, that he might be elected President. You hated him, and therefore you incapacitated him constitutionally. I do not want him to die believing that he could have been elected President of the United States if he had not been prevented by a constitutional amendment. I want him to run again; I want him to run twice more if he wants to, and to be beaten both times, and then he will probably be satisfied. But when I fight men I fight them fairly. I would not take advantage of a man by making a provision retroactive so as to keep him from having a free field and a fair opportunity.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. OWEN. I will ask permission of the Senator from Idaho to submit a couple of memorials which I had no opportunity of presenting before. One is from the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma memorializing Congress to pass a law providing for the election of the Federal district judges. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order that under the unanimous-consent agreement no business is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts repeats the point of order made at an earlier hour, which was sustained by the Chair, and the memorials can not now be received.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator from Idaho yield to me to permit me to change the form of the amendment which I proposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York to conform to the decision of the Chair that I should offer it in the shape of an amendment instead of a substitute? I also offer it in this form for the purpose of conforming to the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa. I ask that it be read as it will read after these amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska modifies the proposed amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York. It will be read as modified.

The SECRETARY. In line 6, page 2, after the word "President"——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I have modified the Root amendment as printed. The modification should appear on line 5, after the word "President."

The SECRETARY. After the word "President," in line 5 of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York, insert "for two years or more."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is for the double purpose of meeting the objection urged by the Senator from Idaho. To permit a Vice President to run for election as President after he might have served for five years as President would be contrary to the spirit of this amendment. It also conforms to the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa and still retains most of the verbiage of Senator ROOT's amendment. If the amendment is adopted in this form it will not exclude President Taft, nor ex-President Roosevelt, nor President Elect Wilson from reelection, nor would it exclude from election a Vice President who had acted as President for less than two years.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Secretary to read the amendment as now proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported as it would read if the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska should be agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from New York proposes to strike out the words "under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof," after the word "President," and to insert the words "for two years or more," so that if amended it will read:

> The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of President shall be six years, and no person who has held the office by election or discharged its powers or duties, or acted as President for two years or more after the 4th day of March, 1917, shall be eligible to hold again the office by election.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand that amendment now, instead of extending the term of the present President, for instance, to 10 years, it extends it to 12.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to have the Senator explain how he reaches that conclusion.

Mr. BORAH. Of course I have only listened to the reading of it, but if the term of office of the President should be six years, and no person who has held the office by election or discharged its powers or duties or acted as President for two years or more after the 4th day of March, 1917—perhaps I am in error as I have only listened to the reading and have not examined it.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is quite evident the two years ought not to come in just at that point. I think if the Senator from Nebraska will examine it he will find it ought to be inserted somewhere else.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was endeavoring to conform to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa. I would ask where I should place it.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is qualifying there the time at which this amendment goes into effect if it should be ratified.

Mr. BORAH. If you would make it 1919 instead of 1917——

Mr. CUMMINS. What the Senator from Nebraska means is to say that neither the Vice President nor one who comes in by succession shall be ineligible at all, unless he held the office for two years.

Mr. BORAH. I presume that is precisely what the Senator means, but I do not think his language covers it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think not either. I think he will have to readjust it in some way.

Mr. BORAH. If the amendment is to be left as it is now offered, I shall not make any further remarks upon it.

Mr. JONES. While Senators are fixing up the amendment I will suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington suggests the absence of a quorum. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Bryan	Clapp	Dixon
Bankhead	Burnham	Clark, Wyo.	du Pont

Mr. KERN. I again announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] on account of illness. I make the announcement to stand for to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll 68 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa why in this amendment which has been submitted by the committee he has limited it, making it read "again to hold the office by election." It seems to me making the limitation by election precludes a President from succeeding himself by the votes of the people, but would permit him to run for Vice President and obtain the office by succession, or he could be Secretary of State and obtain it by succession.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. SWANSON. It appears to me if we are going to have simply one term for President and prevent all scheming and let his ambition be satisfied and fulfilled, we ought to strike out the term "by election," and let it be understood there will be distinctly but one term. If the words "by election" are in it seem to me, as we are preparing for the far future, an able, scheming, ambitious man could be President, and if he had the vast power that it is suggested he would acquire he could have a dummy elected President and himself Vice President.

Under this constitutional amendment that dummy could resign, and the Vice President, who had previously been the President, would succeed to the Presidency. At the end of the six years he could have another election of that kind. He could have another man run for President and he himself run for Vice President, and then he could have the man chosen as President resign. Under such a constitutional amendment as that which is proposed here Diaz could perpetuate himself in office in Mexico during his entire life.

It seems to me, if we are preparing for the future and going to have one term for President, we should limit the tenure to one term both by election and by succession; and it seems to me, in order to accomplish this purpose, the words "by election" should be stricken out. I should therefore like to know from the Senator from Iowa why it is that he uses the language "to succeed himself by election"? Why does he not prohibit it otherwise?

Mr. CUMMINS. The reason was because we were not sufficiently imaginative even to conceive of such a situation as that described by the Senator from Virginia. I can not conceive of a dummy being elected President and then resigning in order to allow a Vice President to enter the succession.

Mr. SWANSON. What I should like to ask the Senator is, Could that be done under this proposed amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. The persons who are ineligible are ineligible only to election, and, of course, if a person who had been President were elected Vice President and the President should die or resign, there is nothing in this proposed amendment to prevent the succession of the Vice President; or if a person who had been elected President and had held the office were thereafter made Secretary of State, and the President and Vice President should both die, there is nothing in this amendment to prevent that Secretary of State from succeeding to the office of President.

Mr. SWANSON. Does the Senator from Iowa see any objection to the words "by election" being stricken out and limiting the tenure to one term?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do see some objection to it. We do not in the joint resolution propose to make the Vice President ineligible for reelection; we are dealing with the office of President alone. I do not see why, for instance, a Secretary of State who had succeeded for, say, 30 days to the office of President should not at some future time succeed if all the circumstances combined that bring in a Secretary of State. I think it would render ineligible persons who are not within the principle of the joint resolution.

Mr. SWANSON. If the words "by election" were stricken out, it would not render ineligible anyone except a person who had previously held the office of President.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is all.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, while there might be no trouble ever arise, I think, if we are going to settle the tenure of the office of President so as to restrict it to one term, it ought to be settled distinctly for one term. I therefore move to strike out the words "by election," so as to limit the President absolutely to one term.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment is not in order at the present time.

Mr. SWANSON. I want to submit it so that it may be in order at the proper time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the amendment presented by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] in this matter and the argument by which he supported it is very much like Artemus Ward's patriotism when the war broke out. He was willing that all of his wife's relatives should enlist. It is very much like the effort of some people to get to heaven by laying down rules of good conduct for somebody else to follow which they themselves do not practice. The Senator says that the trouble about this joint resolution is that it discriminates against the ex-President, the present President, and the incoming President; that they will have a disqualification laid upon them which does not apply to anybody else. It seems to me that the exact contrary of that is the case. If the amendment to the joint resolution proposed by the Senator from Nebraska is adopted, we shall be in such a situation that these three men will have a privilege which in the future no other citizen of the United States will have——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just let me complete my sentence. They will be eligible to be elected to the Presidency notwithstanding having served four years, or more than four years, while no other citizen will have that privilege. It is not at all an ex post facto law as the joint resolution was originally framed. The inhibition against ex post facto laws has no application to it. It is simply a question of whether the law shall go into effect to-day or whether it shall go into effect four years from now. That is the only question. Now I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, assuming that the purpose of this proposed amendment is to create a situation in which every President as he comes into office in the future shall know that he can not be renominated or reelected—if that is the purpose of the amendment—does the Senator from Washington think that would apply to Col. Roosevelt or to Mr. Taft?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not hear the first part of his statement.

Mr. CUMMINS. I stated a little while ago that the object of this amendment was to tell every President when he comes into office, "You can not be reelected. You can not hold for any other term than the one for which you are now elected." That is the purpose of the amendment. Is there any departure from that principle in putting everybody in this country upon the same plane with regard to future elections?

The Senator from Washington, it seems to me, is sticking in the bark. He is saying that there is a proposed exception here, when, as a matter of fact, there are no exceptions at all, unless it be in the case of the incoming President, who falls within the category of ex-Presidents, because this amendment will not be and can not be ratified until his term is practically over.

Now, to be absolutely concrete, suppose Mr. Roosevelt were again elected President of the United States. This amendment tells him when he comes in, "You can not be reelected, and therefore you must discharge your duties without any ambition of that kind." If Mr. John Smith is elected, it tells him precisely the same thing. There is no difference between the command that it puts upon the ex-President and the command it puts upon any other person. Therefore it seems to me that it is hardly fair for the Senator from Washington to keep insisting that we are creating exceptions by making this amendment apply to everybody in the future, without regard to the offices they have held in the past.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But the Senator from Iowa does not propose to do that; he does not propose to make it apply to everybody in the future without regard to the offices which they have held in the past.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. POINDEXTER. He proposes to except three men——

Mr. CUMMINS. No, sir.

Mr. POINDEXTER. On account of the offices and notwithstanding the offices they have held in the past.

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not except anybody.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is difficult for me to understand how the Senator reaches that conclusion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Because it says that no man who is hereafter elected President of the United States shall serve for more than one term. That is the proposed amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, the proposition of adopting that amendment is the subject under discussion. That is not the original joint resolution. The question is whether or not——

Mr. CUMMINS. That is not the original joint resolution.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No.

Mr. CUMMINS. And I did not suppose that anybody in the world would ever insist that it was aimed at Col. Roosevelt or at anybody else. That idea has arisen since. It has been very busily promulgated throughout the United States that we were engaged here in trying to render Col. Roosevelt ineligible to reelection as President.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I myself think that that is a very low plane upon which to put this discussion.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do, too.

Mr. POINDEXTER. And I am sure that nobody would resent it more quickly than would Col. Roosevelt.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree to that. I think it must be abhorrent to him; I know it is abhorrent to him.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Undoubtedly, so far as his personal ambitions or intentions may be concerned, and it is, if I may be allowed to say so, abhorrent to me, and difficult to conceive of the Senate of the United States voting upon a question of this kind affected in any degree whatever by its application to individuals or by its effect upon the political ambitions of the friends or the opponents of Senators who vote upon the question.

My opposition to this resolution is based upon a sincere conviction that it would be a political and governmental mistake. I am perfectly frank to say that, being opposed to the entire resolution, it is perfectly agreeable to me to oppose the introduction of amendments to it which, I think, would give it an artificial strength; but I am opposed also to the proposed amendment upon principle, because I believe, if the original joint resolution is sound at all, it ought to be applied now.

The proposition of the friends of this amendment is that the resolution is a very important improvement of the Constitution and of our political system, in the conditions of electing Presidents, but that we want to excuse ourselves and our friends at the present time from being subjected to that improvement in the Constitution. We are asked to lay down a rule of government for the people who are to come four years from now and who will be in the center of the stage at that time.

The best thing that we can do for our descendants is to furnish them good ancestors, and the best thing we can do for the people who come after us, so far as the political affairs of this country are concerned, is to now conduct the political affairs of the country properly in order that we may pass on uninjured to them the frame of government and the political system which is deemed best and wisest. If we want the people 4 years from now or 10 years from now to adopt this rule the best argument that we can advance to them in its behalf is that we have adopted it ourselves and made it applicable at the present time to the leaders of the various parties in this year, instead of four years from now.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] said—and I only want to say one word with reference to his argument and, of course, I want to pass aside entirely his implication that this amendment to the joint resolution only concerns Col. Roosevelt, because, of course, it concerns Mr. Taft and Mr. Wilson as well, and their friends, but that personal element has nothing to do with it—the Senator said, in effect, in his argument that the amendment ought to be adopted so that the resolution might meet the approval of the American people. He said that if this resolution should go out for the ratification of the people of the country bearing its effect upon the leaders of the party to-day, the friends of these leaders—he said the friends of Col. Roosevelt, but I will enlarge that by saying the friends of the leaders of the different parties—will oppose the resolution. Well, why will they oppose it? Supposing that that is the reason that they will oppose it, upon what principle is it based? Because, in their judgment, we must assume that these people believe that it is for the best interest of this country that the leaders of their party should serve as President of the United States notwithstanding the fact that they have been President before; in other words, that it is the judgment of the American people that the obstacle of having served as President of the United States ought not to be considered in the choice of a President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. If that is their judgment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just a moment—if that is their judgment, it is the judgment of the people upon the merits of the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, of course the Senator's view of why they should oppose this is his view, but that is not mine. The reason why I think they would oppose it if it went before them in that shape would be because they would regard it as affected with a personal tinge that would make it, in their opinion unjust and unfair, because they would regard it as retroactive legislation and addressed at persons. My experience is that the people generally resent anything that they regard as being unfair or of the character which I have indicated, and I myself think it would be unfair. I think it is unfair to pass a law for the guidance of conduct in the future and make it retroactive.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator believe that it would be any more unfair to the people of the country now to deprive them of the privilege of selecting their choice for President of the United States without this restriction than it would be unfair to deprive the people of the country 4 or 10 years from now, or the next generation, of the privilege of selecting their choice as President?

Mr. WILLIAMS. "Law" is defined to be "a prescribed rule of conduct." If a contingency occurs for operation under the law after it has been passed, and when the nature of the law is known to everybody, when it operates equally upon everybody it can be unfair to nobody; but if a law is made to retroact, then, so far as its retroactive effect is concerned, it is not a prescription but it is a postscription, and that is the reason why it is unfair. Now, in answer to the Senator's question—and I think that answers it—it can not be unfair at all afterwards, though it might be considered unfair if it were retroactive. I myself would so consider it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, Mr. President, I do not consider that the joint resolution would be retroactive; in fact, it is not retroactive in its terms and it is not retroactive in its effect. It takes effect from the present time, if it is adopted, without this amendment. It does not take effect in the past; it did not in any way whatever influence or prevent the election of either one of these gentlemen as President in past years or affect the term which they served, but operates as to whether or not they as well as other citizens of the United States under like conditions shall be reelected at some time in the future. It is in futuro and not ex post facto either in its terms or in its effect.

The Senator from Mississippi must not forget that the people hereafter will have their favorite leaders of political policies and parties in which they believe as well as the people of to-day, and that they will be just as anxious to be free to choose their leaders and champions in the political conflicts of the country then as they are now. There will be no difference in that condition from the existing condition which the Senator desires to except from this amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, of course the people will hereafter have their favorites and sometimes their idols as much as they have them now. But there is a very broad difference between the condition of things that will exist after the adoption of this amendment and the condition of things now. Hereafter men will have notice served upon them beforehand that the utmost they can do for their favorite is to elect him for the prescribed term which the Constitution shall fix. As a consequence of that, knowing beforehand, before they make him President for the first time, that they can not make him President the second time, they will not feel themselves unfairly dealt with. But they might feel themselves unfairly dealt with if you said to them: "This man shall not be reelected," although at the time he was elected the first time no such rule existed. It will have the effect upon the men themselves of restraining hero worship and human idol worship within certain limits.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I readily see the distinction which the Senator from Mississippi seeks to draw. But in my judgment it is evidently not in accordance with the effect of the resolution, because while it is true that in future the people will have notice served upon them by this resolution that their favorites will be ineligible, the friends of the present leaders to whom we have referred will likewise have notice served upon them by the resolution that those leaders are not eligible. There is no difference in that respect.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But, if the Senator will pardon me, in the one case the offense, if I may so call it, which would be penalized would have been committed after the law was passed, and in the other case it would have been committed before the law was passed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In other words, the amendment amounts to this: The penalty for being once elected President of the United States, if this amendment becomes part of the Constitution, is that the man thus elected shall not be again elected. That penalty was not announced to the world as to these gentlemen.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Let me ask the Senator a question. Is it not true that the offense is not the original election to office, if you desire to call it an offense at all? I think "offense" is scarcely the proper term.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course that is metaphorical.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is not the original election, but it is the reelection, the continuous election, that is the so-called offense. If that is to be committed, it will be committed in the future, and can only be committed in the future, by Mr. Taft or Mr. Wilson or Mr. Roosevelt, as well as by those that will come after them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The word "penalize" is, of course, an unfortunate one; but just at this moment I can not think of a better one to put in its place. In effect, if this amendment becomes a part of the Constitution, a man is penalized for having been elected once by being denied the privilege of being elected any more. As to the future, after the law goes into operation, everybody has full notice of that before he goes into the presidential office, and his friends have full notice of it. Nobody could contend that there was anything unequal or unfair about it then. But if a man had been elected President before that time, and you were to apply the rule to him, you would be penalizing him—to use that word again—for an act which took place prior to the existence of the law, and that would produce the feeling that an unfair thing had been done.

The Senator from Washington and I both understand that when we are running for office and have an antagonist, we would give him $500 any day in the world to do a patently unfair thing, or a thing that the people would regard as unfair. There would be no surer way of electing him or me than for our antagonist to do a thing of that sort. So that necessarily there would be a degree of antagonism—and the Senator is right in saying so—not upon the part of the followers of one of these gentlemen alone, but perhaps to a certain extent upon the part of the followers of the other. I refer to that gentleman alone, because there is an earnestness and a zeal and—if I may use the word—a quasi fanaticism behind his supporters.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is on account of his superior merit.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That may be. Undoubtedly it is on account of his excessive merit in the minds of his supporters.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Exactly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is not the first time that an idea has taken the place of a thing in the history of the world. The tulip craze in Holland is a startling example of it, and the belief in the soundness of the Mississippi bubble is another. But however that may be, I am now attempting to apologize for having referred to one more than another, because he was in my mind, and that is probably the reason he was in my mind. That, at least, was my conception.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very glad to know that the Senator admits, at least, that there is a general principle at stake, and not merely a personal and individual issue.

In answer to the question which the Senator from Iowa asked a moment ago, I will say that I think the fallacy of the proposition included in the question is in his assumption that the only object of the resolution is to serve notice upon the incoming President that he can not be reelected for the influence and effect it will have upon the administration of the office. I do not think that is the only object of the resolution on the part of many, at least, of those who are supporting it. I think an object that is, at least, equally important in their conception of it is the substantial fact, the substantive, concrete proposition of preventing a man from serving any longer than six years in the Presidency, not only for the effect it would have upon his six-year administration, but because it would be considered an insidious danger to the Republic that he should serve an indefinite number of terms.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. President, I do not think any action of this kind should be in any sense retroactive. Whether this is in fact retroactive or not, it is certainly so in its application. Then I do not think that any such action should be in any sense personal. It has been perfectly evident in this discussion that this is what is most dreaded; and, in fact, the amendments now offered are for the purpose of avoiding making it personal, and in a certain sense making it retroactive.

I think the best amendment that has been offered so far was that offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, which proposed that the term of the office of President shall be for four years and that no one should hold the office for more than one additional term.

The idea in making this a six-year term is that there shall be but one term. If we allow two terms, as is suggested by the amendment referred to, it will be proper to have only a four-year term.

We seem to have lost sight of one important fact in this discussion, which is that one of the most baleful influences in the election of Presidents is that of a President choosing his successor. I think it is just as dangerous as for a President to undertake to succeed himself. We have had a concrete example of that sort of thing very recently. There has never been an administration so paralyzed as the one we have just had by the effort to carry out a certain line of policies, not by a man succeeding himself, but by a man choosing his successor to do so. It was necessarily more or less of a failure on this account.

I do not think we should lose sight of this for a minute, because it is just as dangerous as the other.

I think the whole amendment is a mistake, in fact. I think it would be better to go back to the original plan we have followed all the while. If anything, we should simply add the provision that there should not be more than two terms, in order to avoid the ancient fear that we might have a man perpetuate himself in office indefinitely.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether the language of the resolution as reported by the committee, stating that the term of the office of President shall be six years, does affect or was intended to affect the term of office of the next President to be inaugurated?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not answer the Senator from Connecticut. He is a member of the committee, and knows its purpose as well as I. As I remember, that inquiry was not made. I think probably it was not present in the minds of the members of the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not remember whether or not the matter was discussed at the time the resolution was before the committee, and it occurred to me as I was looking at the print of the bill here. I do not, myself, see why it would not, although of course the President elect was elected at a time when the Constitution provided that the term of office should be for four years. But say one or two years hence, if this amendment should take effect, the Constitution would then provide that the term of the office which he would hold should be six years. I was not clear in my own mind whether it was the intention of the Senators, or of the proposed resolution, that that should be accomplished.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think there is any intention about it. I do not remember that the matter was under discussion. I believe that if the amendment were adopted and ratified by the States prior to the expiration of the coming term, it would extend the term, and of course would render the incumbent ineligible for reelection.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am inclined to agree with the Senator on that.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I understand the amendment now before the Senate is that offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has ruled that it is in order.

Mr. CUMMINS. As an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

Mr. BRISTOW. I thought the Senator from New York accepted that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can not accept an amendment. It is for the Senate to decide that question. The question is upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska suggests the absence of a quorum, and the roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cullom	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Cummins	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Dillingham	Martine	Smith, Md.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not intend at this time to discuss the question, but only to express my view upon this amendment. I have an amendment pending, which I am going to ask be substituted at the proper time. I only want to say that I am unutterably opposed to making a distinction between American citizens now living or those who may live in the future. I shall vote against this amendment, because I want every citizen to be placed exactly upon the same grounds, with the same rights to hold an official position. If this is carried into the proposition, in the end I shall be forced to vote against the amendment entirely.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, with the principle embodied in the original joint resolution of the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] I can find no fault, because I believe the principle is sound. I have more than once during the last four or five years expressed myself to that effect and I have not changed my opinion on it. Of late, however, I have been doubtful as to whether that amendment in its form, as presented by the Senator from California, could pass this body; and the result of the discussion yesterday in the Senate satisfied me that there is such a division of opinion among Senators on that subject that it could not be passed.

I believe that there is a possibility, if not a probability of the joint resolution as proposed to be amended by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] passing this body, and therefore I shall vote for that amendment. It is true that if the amendment passes and is ratified, we may possibly not begin to receive the benefits we hope to receive from it for 10 years to come, but after that time the benefits will be continuous and permanent.

In so far as the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska is concerned, which I understood to have been accepted by the Senator from New York, I believe that it should be adopted. I think it should be adopted in the interest of fairness, or if not that, for the fear of possible injustice. The danger that may arise from its adoption, the possibility of one person holding too long a term, is entirely problematical. It may possibly never arise at all; but even if it should, I think we can better afford to adopt that which will work no injustice than to leave it out, when its being left out may operate as a very serious injustice to some of the citizens of this country.

Holding these views, I shall vote for the joint resolution as amended, with the hope that it will pass the Senate and be ratified in due time by the requisite number of States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to inquire whether I can not at this time modify the amendment which I have proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska can make such modification as he pleases.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, in conformity to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, I desire to insert in the amendment of the Senator from New York, in line 4, after the word "election," the words "after the 4th day of March, 1917," and allow the other offer of amendment to stand as applied to line 4. Can the Secretary read the proposed amendment as it would then read?

The SECRETARY. After the word "election," in line 7, in the original joint resolution——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am amending the amendment of the Senator from New York, in line 4, after the word "election," by inserting the words "after the 4th day of March, 1917."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the part he proposes to amend is the text of the original committee amendment, but the Senator can move it as an amendment to the text of the committee amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So it will read as follows:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of President shall be six years, and no person who has held the office by election after the 4th day of March, 1917, or discharged its powers or duties, or acted as President for two years or more after the 4th day of March, 1917, shall be eligible to again hold the office by election.

I think that meets the objections of the Senator from Idaho, which I think were hardly warranted. It conforms to the views of the Senator from Iowa, and it leaves the amendment as I offered it in full force as far as its intent is concerned.

Mr. OLIVER. I call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact that he has again restored the split infinitive.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will ask the Secretary to correct that. I will say to the Senator that was not my error; it was because I took the text of the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. OLIVER. I know that the amendment of the Senator from New York perpetuated it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The amendment I offered did not have the split infinitive.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate further than to express briefly the reasons which induce me to oppose the proposed joint resolution. I do not believe there is any demand for an amendment to the Constitution changing the tenure of the President. I do not believe there is any need for such an amendment in order to secure the best possible results under popular Government. I say I do not believe there is any popular demand for such legislation, because I have heard of none. I recognize, of course, that there are a great many things presented to the country under the statement that the people are demanding them, when the people have not considered them at all. The necessities or apparent necessities of politicians sometimes induce them to claim a popular demand for legislation when it does not exist in fact.

I do not think that any good would be accomplished by the adoption of this joint resolution as a remedy for the evils disclosed by the advocates of this measure. I have no fear that the people will abandon our Republic for a monarchy by placing any man in perpetual power. No man has ever been elected President for a third time, and I do not believe that the people will ever give anyone a third term.

As to preventing the abuse of patronage by a President this measure would be futile. A retiring President could and probably would exercise as much power to secure the nomination of his successor as he would exercise in securing his own renomination. Back of elections and nominations are the people; they have regulated these matters in the past and they will continue to do so in the future. It is proposed that we shall amend the Constitution now through the State legislatures. It is proposed to make it a little more difficult by this amendment for the people to exercise their will hereafter, but, nevertheless, they could do it. In this day and age, when popular opinion is demanding that it shall be easier for the people to control their own Government, I am not in favor of placing any obstacles in their way. I repeat, I do not believe that any good can come from this measure. I can see that possible ill can come from it.

I am especially opposed to this particular amendment to the resolution because it makes exceptions for the benefit of individuals. I know Senators argue with some reason that this is placing all citizens of the future in exactly the same position, but if it is wrong for a President while serving to work for his own renomination, it will be just as wrong for President Wilson to do that as it will be for the next President to do it, and if this proposition is a good one it should apply to all men. If I had voted for any of these amendments—which I have not voted for, because I am opposed to the whole proposition—I would especially oppose this one.

It is readily understood that we ought to have no exceptions to the rule. It is a fact that three gentlemen living in the United States who would possibly be affected by this legislation are the only ones to whom this amendment could apply with special force, and I submit that we have no business to amend our Constitution with the idea of its affecting some particular individual. It should be absolutely general in its statement and uninfluenced by any temporary existing condition.

It is for these reasons, Mr. President, and others which I am not going to stop to mention now, but which have been submitted by other Senators much better than I can state them, that I propose to vote not only against the pending amendment, but against all amendments, and finally against the joint resolution itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment proposed by the committee, page 2, line 7, after the word "election," insert the words "after the 4th day of March, 1917," and in line 8, after the word "President," insert the words "for two years or more."

Mr. POINDEXTER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN (when his name was called). I have a general pair to-day with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MASSEY] and vote "nay."

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. As he is not in the Chamber, I will withhold my vote. If I were free to vote, I would vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). The present occupant of the chair is paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. A memorandum of that Senator reads as follows:

I will vote for a single term of four or six years; on all other propositions "nay."

So the Chair feels at liberty to vote "nay."

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM]. If he were here, I am advised that he would vote "nay." I will therefore take the liberty of voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. RICHARDSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. ROOT's name was called). The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] is absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSTON].

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). In addition to my statement made this morning, that the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is necessarily absent from the city, I desire to state that he is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I will inquire if the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] has voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. HEISKELL] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], which in his absence I transfer to the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I make this transfer for the day. I vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE. I desire to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. CRANE] with the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. OWEN. I transfer my pair from the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to my colleague [Mr. GORE] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MARTIN] is paired with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN], and that he is detained from the Senate on account of sickness.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—27.

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Owen	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Johnson, Me.	Percy	Sutherland

So Mr. HITCHCOCK's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, in the proposed amendment of the committee, lines 8 and 9, strike out the words "under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof" and in lieu insert a comma and the words "after the 4th day of March, 1917."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCUMBER. I now offer an amendment to be inserted in lieu of lines 4 to 10, inclusive, on page 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota submits an amendment to the amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted by the committee embraced in lines 4 to 10, both inclusive, insert the following words:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of office of President shall be for four years; and no person shall be eligible for more than two terms; and no person who has served as President, by succession, under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof, for the major fraction of one term, shall be eligible to hold more than one full term thereafter.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can express in almost a single sentence one of the dominant reasons which governs me in casting my vote in favor of a limitation upon the term of office of the President of the United States. I should be willing to vote for an amendment that would fix the term of office for four years and no more. Next to that I would prefer an amendment that would fix the eligibility for not exceeding two terms of four years each, and if neither of these could be passed I think I would then vote for the proposition for a six years' term.

Mr. President, this matter has so far been discussed, if I catch the spirit of the discussion correctly, upon the theory that we were fixing an official position for a dictator of the United States, and to limit the term of that dictatorship for a certain term of years. This Government is essentially a government by party, and not a government by a President. It should be a government by party rather than a government by a President. Each party relying upon the efficacy of its policies for its continuous existence, depending at all times upon the support of the public, will better present and crystallize into legislation those things which are for the lasting benefit of the people than any other system of conducting a government.

That political party, Mr. President, which gives to the people generally the greatest degree of substantial prosperity ought to continue in control of the Government. If, therefore, the administration of President-elect Wilson is successful, I maintain that it will be due to the Democratic Party and not due to Mr. Wilson; and if the Democratic Party of the United States will during the next four years give us a prosperity in the United States commensurate with our conditions, then I am willing to concede that the Democratic Party is entitled to handle the reins of this Government for the next four years succeeding.

Further than that, Mr. President, neither Mr. Wilson nor any other man has a right morally and ought not to have a right legally to use the great power that he has acquired by reason of being honored by the Democratic Party—a power under which he can build around him a mighty political machine, and through the notoriety that makes his name a household word throughout the land use that power to destroy the party that gave it to him.

If I could so change the Constitution that no President could take advantage of the position which has been given him by a political party to destroy that party, as that power has been exercised at least once before, I would do so. Though the Democratic Party, Mr. President, should be eminently successful in its administration, in its governmental trust, it would be within the power of Mr. Wilson to destroy that party by demanding a renomination, and upon failure to secure it, by organizing a new party within his own for the purpose of destroying it because of its failure to give him a nomination. Mr. President, while it has not heretofore been expressed, I am certain that sentiment is in the minds of a great many Senators who are desirous of voting in favor of an amendment to our Constitution limiting the presidential term.

The two great parties are so evenly matched in strength that a division of one into factional parts will always insure its defeat. It is, therefore, in the power of any man who holds the office of President for four years to destroy the party which placed him in that position. As I believe in a government run by party rather than a government run by a President; as I believe in a government conducted under party policies rather than a government of one man, I wish to see the political party that has earned the support of the people of the United States in its fidelity to the trust that has been imposed upon it by the people have its organization so protected that it can submit its policy with a solid front to the people rather than a number of antagonistic candidates, each claiming to represent the policies of that party.

When this country, Mr. President, is to be ruled by a President, and not by a Congress, then I shall be ready to go further and proceed to abolish a useless Congress. On the other hand, so long as there is to be a government by the people, represented by a political party and not a government by the President, I shall be in favor of so limiting the presidential term as to preclude the President from destroying the very party which made him its leader, and thereby placed in his hands the very instrument for its own destruction.

Mr. President, it has been said in debate by one Senator that if this rule should apply to the President, it should equally apply to the position of any Senator or to any other political position. That can be answered in one single sentence. The candidacy of a Senator for reelection can not possibly have the effect of destroying his own political party. The candidacy of a President for reelection, when he has not been nominated by his party, will most assuredly have that effect. That is the main difference, and it is the controlling difference in the mind of one who believes in the control of the Government, not by the President, but by the Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just one moment. During the last few years, Mr. President, we have exaggerated the importance of the position of the Presidency in the United States, and we have to a great degree minimized the importance of Congress. I believe we should hold Congress, and not the President, responsible for the success of any administration.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Do I understand the Senator to mean that he thinks it a justification for proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States that by doing so some party might be preserved which otherwise might be destroyed by a President?

Mr. McCUMBER. If there is any justification on earth for a political party, there is a justification for its preservation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PAGE in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me that what the Senator from North Dakota desires is a penal statute rather than a constitutional amendment; that it ought to be made a crime for a man who has been a member of one party to ever join another party. That is the only way in which you could prevent a man from going out and being the candidate of another party.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it is perfectly proper for a President or ex-President to join as many parties as he sees fit. I, however, support this constitutional amendment for the very reason I have suggested, and I am not afraid to stand upon the position that I believe in the rule of a political party. The same reasons that will justify any Senator in voting for this proposition upon the grounds which he has given, namely, that a President can so surround himself with a political following that he can perpetuate his own official position term after term, would justify me in voting for this amendment, because a President by so surrounding himself with a political following can destroy his own political party whenever he can not control its nominations. The one reason is just as valid as the other, and if one would be equivalent to a penal statute so also would the other have the same effect.

Mr. President, I should vote for the amendment as it was proposed by the committee if I could reduce the six-year term to four years. I would vote for it anyway even if I could not do that, but the Senate has already voted against the four-year limitation. I think that was the better proposition. Then I would prefer that we should limit the official position to two terms, or one term and the major fraction of another. I have therefore introduced the amendment for that purpose, and shall ask for a vote upon it.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Idaho will pardon me, I suggest the absence of a quorum. If we are coming to the crux of this matter, we ought to have a quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield for the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi suggests the absence of a quorum, and the roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Crawford	Lodge	Shively
Borah	Cummins	McCumber	Simmons
Bourne	Dillingham	McLean	Smith, Ariz.
Bradley	Dixon	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Fletcher	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Bristow	Gallinger	Newlands	Smoot
Brown	Gamble	Oliver	Stephenson
Bryan	Gronna	Owen	Sutherland
Burnham	Jackson	Page	Swanson
Burton	Johnson, Me.	Paynter	Thornton
Catron	Johnston, Ala.	Percy	Townsend
Chamberlain	Johnston, Tex.	Perkins	Wetmore
Chilton	Jones	Perky	Williams
Clapp	Kenyon	Pomerene	Works
Clark, Wyo.	La Follette	Richardson
Clarke, Ark.	Lippitt	Sanders

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll 62 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] reads:

> The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of office of President shall be for four years; and no person shall be eligible for more than two terms, and no person who has served as President, by succession, under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof, for the major fraction of one term, shall be eligible to hold more than one full term thereafter.

The substance of this amendment has been the practice and custom of the American people for a hundred and odd years—ever since the Government began. We have now a term of four years, and at no time have the people ever disclosed any settled purpose of breaking over the precedent which was established, or, rather, the example which was given us by Washington and particularly by Jefferson. This would change the Constitution, it is true, but it would not change that which has become the unwritten law of this country, and it gives rise to the question: What brings on this discussion and this proposed constitutional amendment at this time? What tendency has there been upon the part of the people to break away from the precedent heretofore established and from the rule so long prevailing? There has not been, so far as any permanent result may be referred to, any evidence upon the part of the people as disclosed by their act to establish any other rule than that which has prevailed for 125 years and more. If there had been an effort which could be recognized as representing the well-sustained opinion of the American people, that they would set aside the precedent heretofore established, there might be some reason for this amendment; but we have now experimented for a hundred and odd years; there has been no infraction of the rule, and every time the question has been presented to the American people they have rejected the proposition. We are simply writing into the Constitution that which has been as fairly established as if it had been actually written into the Constitution; and, while I am not in favor of the original resolution, it has one virtue which this has not. I am not going to discuss it now, because I propose to say something upon it later. This amendment makes no change whatever from that which has become a settled conviction in the minds of the American people.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am glad that for once in this discussion I can agree with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. This amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is simply a provision against a third term. I think it would be a useless amendment of the Constitution. The people of this country in all its history have never elected any man to a third term as President of the United States, and, in my judgment, they never will. Therefore it is unnecessary for the Senate to submit an amendment of this kind to the people of this country. The people have already settled that question, in my judgment, and the only effect of the adoption of this amendment would be to defeat the proposition that is regularly before the Senate for its consideration.

I am just as much opposed to a second term as I am to a third, except that the latter does leave to the people of this country the fear and the belief that a man who is elected to a third term may become a dictator or continue to hold office indefinitely; but, so far as the evil effect is concerned, it is just as great, in my judgment, to permit the holding of a second term as it is a third term. As I said in the beginning, however, it would be idle to submit any proposition such as this to the people of this country, because the question has already been settled.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, in substance and essence I can not see the difference which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] seem to think exists between the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota and the original amendment. The purpose of both is to place a limitation upon the time a President of the United States may serve the people of the United States in that office. The original amendment would limit that term of service to six years, while the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota would limit that service under certain conditions to eight years——

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Just let me finish the sentence, if you please. And under certain other conditions that service might end with a four-year period, while under certain other conditions, in the case of succession, that service might cover a term somewhere between four years and eight years, its length depending entirely upon the length of the fractional term; but the purpose of each and all, or if not the purpose of each and all, the effect of each and all of these proposed changes is to fix by constitutional limitation an arbitrary limit to the term of service that may be rendered by a President of the United States.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. WORKS. The great and important difference between the two is that there is an intervening election——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes; I am going to discuss that.

Mr. WORKS. An election to a second term, which is the objectionable feature of the whole business.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am going to discuss that.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am speaking of this feature now.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Will the Senator yield to me before he leaves that point?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. MCCUMBER. The difference between the two is simply that the amendment reported by the committee provides for one term of six years, while the amendment which I offer provides for not exceeding two terms of four years each, or eight years. The one compels us practically to accept for the full term of six years a President who has been elected, while the other allows us to make a change two years earlier, at a regular election, if the American people desire to make that change.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Exactly.

Mr. MCCUMBER. My reason is——

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not care now to yield the floor.

Mr. MCCUMBER. My reason is that if we get a President with whom we are not satisfied we would not be compelled to allow him to remain six full years.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, those are differences of another character. The statement I started out to make, and which I insist upon, is that, so far as the period of service is concerned, the object of each of these amendments is to fix a limitation upon the term of that service. I think myself, if there be virtue in either of them, that the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota has this virtue—that if a President should be elected for a term of four years whose service is not acceptable to the American people and whose services they are anxious to dispense with they can get rid of him two years earlier under the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota than they can under the proposition of the Senator from California; and, Mr. President, it is not unlikely that occasions will arise with as great frequency where the American people are anxious to dispense with the services of a President who is not meeting their expectations and would be glad to get rid of him at the end of four years as that cases will arise where a President of the United States, installed in the office, is so fulfilling the expectations of the American people that they are entirely willing that he shall serve for a term of four years or six years—cases in which, if left to them to say that he shall serve longer, they will gladly say that they wish him to serve them longer.

There is another side to this question. Let us look this situation frankly and fairly in the face. We began the discussion of this proposed constitutional amendment here last August, before Congress adjourned. At that time we were just entering upon a very interesting and in some respects startling political campaign. A striking figure who was the chief topic in that discussion was one of the candidates for the Presidency of the United States. He was the target of irony; he was the target of sarcasm; he was the target of ridicule in address after address delivered day after day here in the Senate. Later on, when the Senator from California began the discussion at this session, he addressed his remarks at considerable length to what he called the unfortunate spectacle of a President and ex-President of the United States hurling epithets at each other during a political campaign. In spite of all that can be said to divert attention away from it, the characters that give emphasis to the consideration of this amendment are these prominent figures in the political life of America to-day.

Mr. President, I for one have no fear of any serious evil following vigorous discussions between two prominent citizens upon the rostrum in this country, even though one be an ex-President and the other a President, and even though in such discussion they use epithets which are not the most elegant that could be used by gentlemen—if they are throwing light upon problems that are before the American people for consideration and solution.

I maintain that regardless of the individuals involved the fierce controversy last year so riveted the attention of the American people upon a condition of things which existed in a great national convention at Chicago that it will be impossible for those same conditions ever to exist again. I am willing to prophesy here and now that never again in another great national convention, as was the case in the last convention, will delegates from the South and from certain Northern States be selected as they were selected and be allowed to sit in a convention and have the deciding vote in naming the candidate of a great political party for the Presidency of the United States. The resultant effect of the vigorous denunciations of Col. Roosevelt which followed that action in Chicago is seen in the fact that the candidate whose nomination was forced upon his party carried only two States, and they two of the smallest and most insignificant so far as political strength in the electoral college is concerned. The vigorous denunciation and the epithets riveted the attention of the American people upon an abuse; and that abuse will be torn up by the roots, eradicated, and never again repeated.

I have no fear that great disaster or danger to American institutions, to American society, and the public welfare will come because vigorous and virile men of strong convictions and courage struggle fiercely in the forum of public debate and denounce conditions like those exposed in the Chicago convention, no matter though one of them be a President and the other an ex-President. But it is asserted we should amend the Constitution of the United States so that no such thing as that can ever again occur. Was this strife between two candidates for the Presidency an injury to the country? Far from it.

Mr. President, talk about patronage being used by a candidate for the Presidency! Suppose you could say here by the adoption of this amendment that Mr. Wilson can not be a candidate for reelection at the end of four years, would that prevent Mr. Wilson as President of the United States from using his power, if he were a bad man, so that such use of it would be detrimental to the public interest? Suppose Mr. Wilson should say, "The Constitution of the United States has been so amended that I am ineligible to reelection, but while I am ineligible I am under obligations to a distinguished citizen of this Republic, whose courage and individuality and eloquence at a crisis in the great national convention where I was nominated were the potent force that made me the nominee and defeated another candidate who on three or four previous ballots secured the vote of a decided majority of that convention; and while I am prevented by the Constitution from being a candidate for reelection myself, I would be an ingrate if I did not, so far as I can, so shape affairs that he should be my successor. Will your constitutional amendment prevent him from doing that?

If it is vicious and wrong for a President to use this power for the purpose of securing a renomination for himself, would it not be equally vicious and wrong for him to use patronage and power for the purpose of securing the nomination of a friend to whom he felt he was so bounden?

So the amendment, if adopted, will not enable you to get away from what you call an evil. If you abolished it there, it would remain in force and effect in a place where it is far more dangerous; that is, in the Congress of the United States.

Take the case of one of these Congressmen, elected to the House, and who knows that at the end of two years he must face his constituents for reelection. He has a lot of post offices in his district to be filled; appointments are made upon the recommendation of the Congressman, and he freely uses that patronage for the purpose of securing renomination and reelection. It is not proposed to touch that.

Every one of these Senators, if he will put aside hypocrisy about this thing, knows that from the time he is installed here for the first term or the second term he is thinking about reelection. If he has the power to use his official influence to secure the appointment of his friends rather than his enemies as marshals, revenue collectors, and numerous other public officers here and there, he uses it in that way. Then why not confine to six years the term of every Senator here, and provide in this amendment that a Senator shall not be eligible for reelection? Why not send along with it a proposed amendment to the Constitution that no Congressman shall hold his office for more than two years?

The American people have gotten along for 125 years with the Constitution as it stands, and we are more democratic now by far than we were when it was framed and adopted. We are enlarging the power of the people all the time instead of limiting it. We are here proposing to put up a barrier, and to ask the American people to ratify it, by which they will foreclose themselves from the right to call into their service the man of the hour during a crisis when the very destiny of the Republic may be hanging in the balance. They are foreclosing themselves from drafting him into service. He may be in the harness. He may have his hand at the helm. He may be guiding the ship of state, and he may be doing it not only to the satisfaction of the American people but in a way that wins the plaudits of mankind everywhere. In the crisis, at the turning point, he is there. He is in control. He has his forces well in hand. He has the confidence of a united people back of him.

It may be an emergency where no other man can take his place. But the 4th of March comes and he steps out and his people have been deprived of the privilege of retaining him and continuing his services—for what reason? Because we are afraid that he might become a despot in America. Because in this age of democratic tendencies, when we are going as far as any representative government has ever gone, through initiative and referendum and recall, in the direction of retaining full control and sway in the hands of the people, we are afraid to leave the bars down so that the American people can continue to employ an efficient servant at a time of great need and danger. We are building up a barrier against it because we are afraid that here, in America, this man might become a despot.

We have no fear of a despot with an American citizenship like this, composed of between ninety and one hundred millions of people clothed with the power of the ballot, with all the traditions of America, with all the love of individuality and freedom that exists in America. Shall it be said that we are afraid of a despot and that we must erect a barrier by a constitutional amendment for the purpose of protecting the people from a despot? Ah, if you look through the gauze of this thing, the real facts back of it are that men become anxious to put off the stage of action some striking, dominant figure who is fearless, who is denouncing wrong, who is shaking things up.

Men would like to go to sleep, and be sluggish and easy-going and undisturbed, and have an administration floating along with the tide for six years or for eight years with no agitation, with no fearlessness about it. That would suit a great many people. We do not want it. It is this vigorous, fearless denunciation of wrongs, this fearless discussion of public questions in the forum, with all the faults and abuses that go along with it, more than any other one thing that gives us security and protection.

I am against the amendment originally proposed and the amendments offered to it. I would rather have two terms of four years each, with an opportunity in the middle to get rid of a bad President, than to have a term of six years, with no opportunity within that period to get rid of a bad President, and an absolute limitation upon the right to continue the service of a good President for a longer time. I do not see in that anything sound or wholesome or which has in it any protective principle for the American people. I shall vote against every amendment proposed to this resolution, and against the resolution itself.

SENATOR FROM ARKANSAS.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I present the credentials of WILLIAMS MARMADUKE KAVANAUGH, Senator elect from the State of Arkansas, and ask that they be read and placed on file.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the credentials.

The credentials of WILLIAMS MARMADUKE KAVANAUGH, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Arkansas a Senator from that State to fill the unexpired portion of the term ending March 3, 1913, occasioned by the death of the late Senator JEFF DAVIS, were read and ordered to be filed.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator elect is present, and I ask that the oath of office be administered to him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator elect will present himself at the desk for the purpose of taking the oath.

Mr. KAVANAUGH was escorted to the Vice President's desk by Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas, and, the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, "the man of the hour," "at the very crisis," "the life of the Nation is at stake," "the dominant figure who is fearless." We have just heard those phrases. They are phrases that are familiar—very familiar. They are the phrases that passed from one lip to another, understanding, about the time Cromwell turned Parliament out of doors and about the time Napoleon Bonaparte kicked out the Corps du Legislatif.

"We are not afraid of a despot." Neither was any other fool nation that ever existed until after they got him; and they did not know when they were getting him, either, as far as that is concerned.

So much for that. These be well-known words. They have been the excuse for every coup d'état. They have been the excuse for every fanatical, revolutionary usurpation of authority that ever took place in the world; and the very crisis which is regarded as a thing to be taken care of gives the only opportunity for their effective use.

You do not carry on governments to take care of crises. You take care of things that are not crises. Crises are going to take care of themselves some way or other—God only knows how. If the crisis is big enough, it will overturn the whole Government. You need not fear about that.

The Senator from Idaho—and in this his words are echoed by the Senator from California—urges that the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] ought not to be adopted because it would be merely writing into the Constitution the present unwritten law and practice of the Republic. Each one of them says that for 125 years the American people have refused to vary from that law and from that practice. That is very true; but had it not been for the example set for them and the reasons given for it, they would have varied from it many times perhaps.

The fact that for 125 years this salutary principle and practice has not been departed from is not a reason why the principle should not be written in words into the Constitution of the country. It is true that for 125 years the American people have refused to depart from that principle. But it can not be said that either ambitious men or ambitious followers of men have not attempted to persuade them to depart from it.

In one case a great general, who had been President for two terms, undertook to break down the principle and practice. He was rebuked by his own party. In another case a great colonel, who had been President for virtually two terms, undertook to break down the principle and the practice. True, he was rebuked by all parties. But there is sufficient warning to put us upon guard; sufficient warning to give us notice that the principle is never safe as long as it is unwritten, and as long as there is the right in no man's mouth to say to those who attempt to break it down that they are committing treason against American institutions.

The amendment introduced by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is identical, so far as I can see, with the amendment which I introduced the other day and withdrew temporarily, saying that I would reintroduce it when the committee amendments had been considered by the Senate. I did not notice this morning that the committee amendments had been finished and that the Senator from North Dakota offered his amendment. As I have no pride of authorship any more than he has, I shall withdraw my own amendment and support his, first desiring the opportunity to let the Senate know that the two amendments are identical in purpose and in intendment, with a little difference of phraseology only, I believe. I am willing to admit that the Senator's amendment is better than my own. It is a bit more concise and expresses precisely the same idea.

One word concerning the difference between the original amendment introduced by the Senator from California and that now being discussed as an amendment to it. The amendment of the Senator from California gives a term of six years, during which you can not get rid of a President, no matter how bad a President he is. The American people have several times had their flesh creeping to get rid of a President before four years had expired. They got rid of John Adams, they got rid of John Quincy Adams, they got rid of Van Buren, they got rid of Tyler, they got rid of Andrew Johnson, just as soon as they could get a chance to do it. In one or two cases, and especially in the case of John Adams and of Andrew Johnson, the conditions were almost revolutionary, so that it looked for a while as if we might have to overturn the Government to get rid of them, in the one case by the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions, and in the other case by a farcical and very unjust impeachment proceeding, resorted to for the purpose of revolutionizing the Government, and which would not have been resorted to if the people could have gotten a chance to vote earlier.

The proposition offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] is for a term of eight years, with an opportunity for the people to recall the incumbent in the middle of the term. That is what it means. You may call it two terms of four years each, but it is just as if you had proposed an amendment for an eight-year term, and said that there should be an opportunity at the end of four years to recall him. Yet the Senator from California—who, if I am not misinformed, is a great initiative, referendum, and recall man—does not want this opportunity given to recall at the end of the shorter term.

It amounts to the same thing, except that it is the orderly, prescribed method of recall, as all elections for short terms are, instead of being a haphazard thing, to be gotten up upon a petition that may come overnight or at any time when the people are not looking for it en masse. It is the opportunity for recall at a prescribed date which everybody knows beforehand. The very fact that the principle has been carried out in practice for 125 years is a reason why we ought to put it above the danger or the risk of overthrow.

The amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota being precisely my own, I shall not offer mine afterwards, but shall ask those who agree with the idea which is contained in both to vote for his amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we have the principle of the recall in the Constitution at present as it would be found in this amendment, and that is the reason why, to my mind, there is no danger in this situation.

If we had in the Constitution a provision by which a man could hold the Presidency for a long term of years until the people lost interest in his successor, there would be much logic in the argument of the Senator from Mississippi. But the principle of the recall, as the Senator refers to the recall now, is written in the Constitution, and that is the great safeguard. A man must go back to the people every four years for his certificate of continuance in office, and the people of the United States must pass upon the question of whether or not he is fit to continue in office. So long as the principle of the recall is there, obligating the person holding the office to recur to the people for approval or condemnation of his course, to my mind it is perfectly safe to leave it there.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho pardon an interruption?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the Senator from Idaho remember that Napoleon the Third submitted to the French people some 8 or 10 plebiscites in order to establish his usurpation, and got a majority for each one of them? Does not the Senator know that if the proper condition of things or presentation of circumstances occurs unless there is some barrier recall either under that name or by election at times ceases to be a protection to the majority themselves, owing to the idol worship of the majority? Does he not know that that has been history for all time?

Mr. BORAH. No; I am sorry to say the Senator from Idaho is not familiar with that historic fact. The fact is that Napoleon was elected to the consulship, and that he usurped the power which he finally acquired during the term of the office for which he had been elected, and in violation of the rule which the Senator would now write into the Constitution. It simply illustrates the fact that when the people reach the level where they want some one to rule over them permanently they will give no heed or attention to the fact that there is a written provision against it. They did not do so with reference to Napoleon; neither did they do so with reference to Cæsar. In both instances the men usurped their power in violation of the written law of their country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but they submitted their claims to the people.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And by an overwhelming vote in the case of Napoleon the First, and by an equally overwhelming vote upon the plebiscites under Napoleon the Third, each successive act of usurpation was ratified.

Mr. BORAH. That is quite true. They submitted the matter to the people. But what we are arguing against now is the efficacy or the inefficacy of a written constitution prohibiting them from selecting the man if they desired to. They had the written law in both instances, and yet they selected the man in spite of that fact.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But they selected one as Consul and the other as President, and each one of whom turned himself into an emperor.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; and he usurped his power in violation of the law. It all comes back to the question whether or not the people are capable of determining whom they will have for President of the United States, the recall provision being embedded in the Constitution so as to necessitate the resubmission of the question to the people every four years.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to be permitted to call to the attention of the Senator from Idaho the fact that the action of the people who voted for Julius Cæsar under the safeguard of a Pretorian Guard and the people who voted for Napoleon Bonaparte as First Consul, when they had no telegraph and no telephone and no newspapers and no railroads and no general intelligence, compared with that which is now possessed by the American people, ought not to be used in this debate as a basis for our consideration of the ability of the people to use discretion in the exercise of the suffrage.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho agrees perfectly with the Senator from Oklahoma.

A great deal has been said with reference to the example of Washington and of Jefferson; and I certainly would not, if I could, detract anything from the worth of those examples. But something is due to the American people themselves. It is not exactly in accordance with the facts as I understand them to say that without these examples the reverse of that which followed would have been true, because we had the question presented in the case of Gen. Grant. Grant saw fit to permit his name to be used in violation of the precedent which had been established, and the people of the United States within his own party rejected his aspirations to the office. If we have any confidence at all in the capacity of the American people to carry on a representative form of government, we certainly can afford to trust them to select their Chief Magistrate when the matter is to be submitted to them for their consideration, as it is now, once every four years.

If the people can not select a Chief Magistrate for a second term or refuse him the third and the fourth after they have had an opportunity to know his course in public life, the first selection is a mere matter of chance and of guesswork. They have more information, they have a greater opportunity to know, they can pass upon the matter with greater intelligence the second time or the third time than they could the first time. The entire matter rests at last with the intelligence, the patriotism, and the thoughtful consideration of the people who select their Chief Magistrate in this country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota to the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I suggest the want of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota suggests the absence of a quorum. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cummins	Kern	Perky
Bankhead	Dillingham	La Follette	Pomerene
Borah	Dixon	Lippitt	Richardson
Bourne	du Pont	Lodge	Simmons
Brandegee	Fletcher	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Bristow	Gallinger	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Brown	Gamble	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Gardner	Myers	Smoot
Burton	Gronna	Nelson	Stephenson
Catron	Hitchcock	Newlands	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Jackson	Oliver	Swanson
Chilton	Johnson, Me.	Overman	Thomas
Clapp	Johnston, Ala.	Owen	Thornton
Clark, Wyo.	Johnston, Tex.	Page	Townsend
Clarke, Ark.	Jones	Paynter	Wetmore
Crawford	Kavanaugh	Percy	Williams
Culberson	Kenyon	Perkins	Works

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the amendment to the amendment be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of so much of the committee amendment as proposes to insert the words embraced in lines 4 to 10, both inclusive, on page 2, insert:

> The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of office of President shall be for four years; and no person shall be eligible for more than two terms, and no person who has served as President, by succession, under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof, for the major fraction of one term, shall be eligible to hold more than one full term thereafter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, my attention has been called to a respect in which our two amendments are not identical. I wish to offer an amendment to this amendment so as to cure the evil. I wish to strike out the words "has served" and insert in lieu thereof the words "shall hereafter serve." That will prevent what I think most of us are anxious to prevent—injecting any personal issue into the matter. If it should go through as it is now worded by the Senator from North Dakota it would prevent anybody who hitherto had served from being reelected, and that is not the purpose I take it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there is wherein the two amendments differ.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not notice that difference until a moment ago, when my attention was called to it.

Mr. McCUMBER. The amendment represents my own view, that we should make no distinction between persons who have served and persons who may serve hereafter, that the law should apply to all American citizens exactly the same.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, with that explanation, I offer an amendment to the amendment, to strike out the words "has served," on line 4, of the Senator's amendment, and to substitute the words "shall hereafter serve."

Mr. McCUMBER. I rise to a point of order, as to whether that amendment can be offered now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment is clearly in order.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is an amendment to the amendment, and it is clearly in order. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 4, strike out the words "has served" and in lieu insert the words "shall hereafter serve," so that if amended it will read:

> And no person shall be eligible for more than two terms, and no person who shall hereafter serve as President, by succession, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I find it is necessary after the word "President" to put in "by election or."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment as modified will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "President," in line 5, insert the words "by election or," so that if amended it will read:

> The term of office of President shall be for four years; and no person shall be eligible for more than two terms, and no person who shall hereafter serve as President by election or by succession, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The noes have it, and the amendment to the amendment is rejected.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move to amend the McCumber amendment by striking out the words "two terms," in line 4, and inserting the words "one term."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Texas to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call for a division.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected, there being, on a division—ayes 9, noes 40.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). The present occupant of the chair is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], and withholds his vote.

Mr. GARDNER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Texas (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], and withold my vote.

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], and withhold my vote.

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to my colleague [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM], but as he would vote "nay" on this proposition I will take the liberty of voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. RICHARDSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KERN. I have a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote "nay."

Mr. CLAPP (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and not knowing how he would vote if present, I desire to withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 3, nays 61, as follows:

YEAS—3.

McCumber	Penrose	Williams

NAYS—61.

Ashurst	Cullom	La Follette	Sanders
Bankhead	Cummins	Lodge	Shively
Borah	Dillingham	McLean	Smith, Ariz.
Bourne	Dixon	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	du Pont	Myers	Smoot
Bristow	Fletcher	Nelson	Stephenson
Bryan	Gamble	Newlands	Sutherland
Burnham	Gronna	Oliver	Swanson
Burton	Hitchcock	Overman	Thomas
Catron	Jackson	Owen	Thornton
Chamberlain	Johnson, Me.	Page	Townsend
Chilton	Johnston, Ala.	Paynter	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Perkins	Works
Clarke, Ark.	Kavanaugh	Perky
Crawford	Kenyon	Poindexter
Culberson	Kern	Pomerene

NOT VOTING—31.

Bacon	Foster	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ga.
Bradley	Gallinger	Massey	Smith, Mich.
Briggs	Gardner	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Brown	Gore	Percy	Stone
Clapp	Guggenheim	Reed	Tillman
Crane	Johnston, Tex.	Richardson	Warren
Curtis	Lea	Root	Watson
Fall	Lippitt	Simmons

So Mr. MCCUMBER's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PAYNTER. Yesterday I suggested that I would offer an amendment, but at that time it was not in order. I offer it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky submits an amendment to the amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 of the amendment of the committee, line 10, after the word "election," insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the term of the incumbent in the office of President when this amendment takes effect shall be for six years.

Mr. PAYNTER. I should like to have the amendment reported by the committee read in connection with my amendment, and then I will give my reasons for offering the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read as it would read if amended by the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

The SECRETARY. If amended, the amendment of the committee in so far as inserting new words are concerned will read:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of the President shall be six years, and no person who has held the office by election or discharged its powers or duties or acted as President under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof shall be eligible to hold again the office by election: Provided, That the term of the incumbent in the office of President when this amendment takes effect shall be for six years.

The President, together with a Vice President chosen for the same term, shall be elected as follows.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President, in making an amendment to the Constitution if it is probable that any doubt may arise hereafter or is now in the minds of the Senators it ought to be removed. That which can be made certain never should be left uncertain and in doubt. Especially is that the case when we are dealing with the greatest office of our country. We know what a serious political conflict might arise over the question of succession in the presidential office, one of the political parties claiming that the term ended at one time and another political party claiming it did end at another time.

My own opinion is that under the amendment as reported from the committee the incoming President will hold his term for six years if it is adopted during his term; I do not intend to elaborate and to give the reasons which I have for it except to state that that provision of the Constitution will be the controlling one as to the tenure of the office whenever it is ratified and becomes a part of the Constitution. It will be, indeed, the only provision in the Constitution which determines the tenure of office at the expiration of four years from the 4th of next March. So my opinion is that the effect of this amendment is to prolong the term and to make it six years instead of four.

If I am correct in this, then why not adopt my amendment, which will make it absolutely certain as to what the Congress means by the language that it has employed?

It may be said that this is extending the term of the President two years. That may be true, but if the proper interpretation is given to the amendment as reported by the committee, it has exactly the same effect as it will have by adopting the amendment which I have offered. In other words, it does not change the import of the amendment to the Constitution reported by the committee.

It will make certain that which otherwise might be in doubt.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have always understood that the adoption of this proposed amendment would have just the effect which it is proposed to be made certain by the amendment now offered by the Senator from Kentucky. I have never had any doubt that the adoption of the amendment as it comes from the committee would have the effect to extend the term of the incumbent of the office to six years.

I think the people of this country ought to know and understand exactly what this amendment does provide for. There should be no uncertainty with respect to it. If the people are not willing to adopt it with that construction placed upon it, we certainly ought not to send it out to the country with any question remaining as to what the effect of it is to be.

I hope for that reason that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. PAYNTER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when the name of Mr. GALLINGER was called). The occupant of the chair is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], and refrain from voting.

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM]. As he is absent from the Chamber, and I do not know how he would vote on this question if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. RICHARDSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and refrain from voting.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OWEN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to my colleague [Mr. GORE] and vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—30.

Ashurst	Johnson, Me	Overman	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Johnston, Ala.	Owen	Swanson
Burton	Jones	Percy	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kavanaugh	Perkins	Thornton
Chilton	Kern	Perky	Williams
Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Simmons	Works
Fletcher	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Hitchcock	Newlands	Smith, Ga.

NAYS—36.

Borah	Clarke, Ark.	Jackson	Poindexter
Bourne	Crawford	Kenyon	Pomerene
Bradley	Culberson	La Follette	Sanders
Brandegee	Cullom	Lodge	Shively
Bristow	Dillingham	McCumber	Smoot
Burnham	Dixon	McLean	Stephenson
Catron	du Pont	Oliver	Sutherland
Clapp	Gamble	Page	Townsend
Clark, Wyo.	Gronna	Penrose	Wetmore

NOT VOTING—29.

Bacon	Gallinger	Massey	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Gardner	Nelson	Stone
Briggs	Gore	O'Gorman	Tillman
Brown	Guggenheim	Paynter	Warren
Crane	Johnston, Tex.	Reed	Watson
Curtis	Lea	Richardson
Fall	Lippitt	Root
Foster	Martin, Va.	Smith, Mich.

So Mr. PAYNTER's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. OWEN. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment of the committee, on page 2, line 12, strike out the words "elected as follows" and insert:

Nominated and elected by the direct vote of the legal voters of the States. The vote of each State shall be certified by the governor of the State to the President of the United States Senate and, estimated upon the basis that the vote of each State shall be equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may be entitled in the Congress, shall be counted and declared as by law provided. Congress shall immediately provide by law the method and means for the direct nominations herein provided.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, this amendment does away with the electoral college. It proposes that the vote of the States shall be certified to the President of the Senate, and have the same weight in determining the election of a President as now under the electoral-college system. It, of course, would serve the end of economy in making unnecessary the nomination of 400 or 500 electors, in making unnecessary the printing of their names and the voting for those electors by millions of voters and the counting of the vote. It would save time and would operate more directly to produce the result desired.

The more important part of the amendment, however, is that providing for the direct nomination by popular vote of presidential candidates and doing away with the national conventions, which heretofore have been in some instances believed to have been unfairly controlled by machine methods and by improper influences. It is carrying out what many of the States now have; it is carrying out the principles of progressive government; it is carrying out the proposals laid down in the Democratic national platform at Baltimore; it is carrying out the declarations of the so-called Progressive Party, and I think will be acquiesced in by probably three-fourths of the people of the United States.

It needs no argument to explain the meaning of a preferential primary for the Presidency, and no debate upon it, so far as I am concerned, is thought necessary. I simply briefly explain the amendment itself. It proposes a presidential preference primary; does away with the electoral college; and has the vote certified immediately to the President of the Senate, to be counted as now provided by law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I want to say a few words in explanation of the vote I shall cast. I shall vote for this amendment, not chiefly for the reason stated by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], but chiefly for another reason.

The electoral college is a source of danger to American institutions. It may some day precipitate a great crisis and a revolution. Of course, the unwritten law is that the elector votes in accordance with the dictates of the party to which he belongs and votes for the nominee of his convention, or, in this case, if this amendment is adopted, the nominee of the presidential primaries of his party. But there is no law which compels him to do it. It is merely a matter of keeping faith and honor. It is a great compliment to the American people that hitherto in every case faith and honor have been kept; but the statement does not go without contradiction that they will always be kept.

There might be a very close presidential election, when one or two votes swerved from the direction in which the people had shot them into a new direction, either by passion, prejudice, money, or corruption—something or other might defeat the will of the people in an election. It might be true that in such a case an elector would hesitate a long time because of the fear of personal danger that would follow; but corrupt men are sometimes very bold. There is hardly a pledge of honor made in any direct way. The party merely nominates the electors, and it is taken for granted that they are going to act honorably. Thus far they have done so; but suppose some one in a case like that did not do so. If each party insisted, one upon the right to take the seat because the machinery provided by the Constitution to elect him had elected him, to wit, a majority of the electoral college, and the other, the choice of the people, asserted the right to the seat, there might be great trouble; there might possibly be even civil war; but, at any rate, if there were not, the will of the people might be defeated. It is for that reason, more than for the reason that the amendment contains the direct-nomination feature, that I shall support it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma for a moment. I wish to call his attention to the fact that if his amendment were adopted it might not accomplish the purpose which he has in view; in other words, there would still be left in the Constitution all its provisions with regard to the selection of electors, the counting of their votes before Congress, and the subsequent arrangements in case there be no choice.

Mr. OWEN. It would be explicitly repealed.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seems to me that the Senator has not successfully joined the amendment with those provisions of the Constitution that would remain.

Mr. OWEN. My amendment would be in conflict with so much of it as the Senator refers to, and would repeal it. The language has been so drawn as to cause that vote to be counted and declared as provided by law. It, therefore, attaches itself immediately to the present provisions for the counting of the electoral vote in the House of Representatives.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am entirely in favor of the election of a President in the way suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma, yet the proposed amendment would, in my opinion, leave the Constitution in inextricable confusion.

Mr. OWEN. Another suggestion has been made, that the governor of a State, not being a Federal officer, might refuse to certify the returns. The governor of every State takes an oath to observe the Constitution of the United States as well as that of his own State. This would be a part of his oath of office, and he would be pro tanto an officer of the United States for this purpose.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma to the fact that there is a proposed amendment to the Constitution now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary providing for the election of President and Vice President by a direct vote of the people which covers all the provisions relating to the subject of elections and returns. It seems to me it would be unfortunate to complicate this one question with so important a question as that, which may probably be considered by itself and be voted upon separately.

Mr. OWEN. The fact that some other proposition is pending elsewhere in no wise invalidates the propriety of this amendment.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. OWEN. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The subject with which the Senator from Oklahoma is dealing in his proposed amendment is one in regard to which I am in entire sympathy with the Senator. I should like to see an amendment submitted which would reach that end, but I think it is rather unfortunate to couple it with this proposal for limiting the term of the President of the United States, because upon that proposition I am unalterably opposed to a limitation. If this provision, in which I believe, is tied up with that proposition, in which I do not believe, my vote would go on the side against the amendment proposed by the Senator, because I can not indorse the other, and I think it would be better to have this proposition a separate one standing upon its own merits. I think the Senator would thereby get more friends for it.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I will offer as an extenuating circumstance in submitting my amendment at this time the statement that it is extremely difficult to amend the Constitution of the United States. It has only been done in the case of war since the first original amendment, barring the probable amendment now pending; so that if an amendment is proposed and carried at all it must be carried upon the wave of some very important public opinion. I believe that nine-tenths of the people of the United States have made up their minds now that they do not want any man to twice hold the position of President; that they do not want any man occupying the White House to use that place and the enormous patronage and power of that position to further his own ambition as a politician. Believing that, I am compelled to reconcile myself to the unhappy position in which I find the Senator from South Dakota posed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think the Senator will find that the people believe in this proposal a good deal more earnestly and profoundly and extensively than they do in the other.

Mr. OWEN. Perhaps that may be true, Mr. President; but I remind the Senator from South Dakota that 4,000,000 men voted for the Progressive candidate in the last election, and favored the naming of a President by a presidential primary. I remind the Senator also that 6,000,000 and more Democrats voted for it, and they are committed to it by the Baltimore convention. Therefore there are over 10,000,000 men now committed to it in this Republic. I take it, therefore, that it has some friends.

Mr. CRAWFORD. To what does the Senator refer? Does he want an election without the intervention of the electoral college?

Mr. OWEN. I refer to the more important part of it—the presidential primary.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly I am not objecting to the presidential primary; I believe in it. The Senator misunderstands me. I believe in both the presidential primary and in the direct election of President, but I do not believe in Senate joint resolution No. 78, introduced by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], to which this amendment is proposed to be attached. I should like to vote for this amendment embracing the presidential primary and the direct election of President, but I do not want it tied onto the proposition in Senate joint resolution No. 78, for which I can not stand, and I certainly insist that 10,000,000 of the American people have not shown that they are in favor of Senate joint resolution No. 78.

Mr. OWEN. Perhaps that may be true; but I think so large a number are in favor of it that it will become the law if it passes this Congress; and since this matter is now before the Senate, fixing the term of office, it is entirely germane and proper to propose the manner of the nomination and election of the candidate who is to hold that term. Since the amendment only proposes a presidential primary and does away with the electoral college, which is now useless and expensive, and does not change the method of State representation, giving to each State a vote in accordance with the number of Representatives and Senators, it therefore only does away with a somewhat cumbersome process and establishes a presidential preference primary. To that I say there is a very large adherence of voters in the United States. Desiring to carry out the Baltimore platform as rapidly as possible, I did not wish to lose a convenient occasion to present the first amendment which the opportunity afforded.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I am sorry that my efforts are unavailing. What I hoped I might do was to persuade the Senator that his entire proposition is so much better than that contained in the pending resolution that he ought to cut loose from the other and not have it hang as a dead-weight upon the amendment he has offered.

Mr. OWEN. Since I am in favor of both, I shall be glad to have my proposition help pull the other along.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. I do not want to be understood by what I said as being opposed to the proposition submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma if it were separately submitted. I am so far committed to that idea that I myself have offered a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for the direct election of the President and Vice President of the United States. Therefore I am not hostile to what the Senator desires, but I think it would be unfortunate to both of these propositions to have them coupled together, for the simple reason that the individual who comes to vote upon it will have to be in favor of both of them in order to vote for the proposed constitutional amendment. There are a great many voters in this country who would be favorable to one of them and opposed to the other. The result would probably be that, if they should go to the country, they would both be defeated; and that is the contingency I desire to avoid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to have the amendment to the amendment again stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 12, it is proposed to strike out the words "elected as follows" and insert:

> Nominated and elected by the direct vote of the legal voters of the States. The vote of each State shall be certified by the governor of the State to the President of the United States Senate and, estimated upon the basis that the vote of each State shall be equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may be entitled in the Congress, shall be counted and declared as by law provided. Congress shall immediately provide by law the method and means for the direct nominations herein provided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. GALLINGER'S name was called). The present occupant of the chair is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], and therefore withholds his vote.

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and refrain from voting.

Mr. OWEN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to my colleague [Mr. GORE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. RICHARDSON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TOWNSEND (after having voted in the negative). I voted "nay" for the purpose of making a statement to the effect that I previously stated that I should vote "nay" on all amendments; but this amendment, which I had not anticipated, I am in favor of, although if it is attached to the pending resolution I shall feel compelled to vote against the amended measure on its final passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I change my vote to "yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. GALLINGER). Under the arrangement made with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] the occupant of the chair feels at liberty to vote, and votes "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 36, as follows:

So Mr. OWEN'S amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. OLIVER. I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, at the end of line 5, it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by inserting the word "every," and in line 6, after the word "President," by inserting the words "elected after the ratification of this amendment."

Mr. OLIVER. I ask that the committee amendment be read as it would appear if my amendment were adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

> The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of every President elected after the ratification of this amendment shall be six years; and no person who has held the office by election, or discharged its power or duties, or acted as President under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof shall be eligible to again hold the office by election.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the noes appear to have it.

Mr. OLIVER. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the amendment be again stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, in explanation of the amendment I wish to say that I do not think it is the right thing for the Congress of the United States and the legislatures of the several States to extend the term of a President who has been elected by the people for a definite term of years. Therefore I think that the constitutional amendment, if adopted and placed before the legislatures for ratification, should apply only to Presidents elected thereafter. I understand if the committee amendment as it now stands should be agreed to unamended it is probable that the term of the President in office at the time would be extended to six years. I am unalterably opposed to that, and if the joint resolution is placed before the Senate in that shape I expect to vote against it; otherwise, as a general proposition, I am now and always have been in favor of a single term of six years for our Presidents.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, in other words, the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania makes a special exemption as to Woodrow Wilson; that is the effect of it. It does not carry out the provision of the Democratic platform, which specifically declares for one term. The amendment now offered is not in accord with the platform of the Democratic convention, which I understand Senators on the other side of the Chamber are urging——

Mr. OLIVER. I am not solicitous for the Democratic platform at all.

Mr. DIXON. I am merely calling the attention of the Democratic Senators to the fact that the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania is in direct violation of the terms of the Democratic platform.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON] has given the right interpretation to the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. It is my opinion that the resolution as reported by the committee would, if adopted as a part of the Constitution during the term of any President, extend that term to six years. I believe that would be its legal effect. Now, the Senator from Pennsylvania proposes an amendment that will relieve the resolution of that effect and confine its operation to those Presidents who are elected after it is ratified. That is to say, it does not make any difference whether it is Mr. Wilson or Mr. Smith or Mr. DIXON. It may be Mr. DIXON.

Mr. DIXON. I am not a candidate.

Mr. CUMMINS. One can not tell what the future has in store for him or for any other aspiring and ambitious and energetic man. This amendment may not be ratified, even if it is adopted here, for years; and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania is general. It simply says it will not prolong the term of the President who is in office at the time it is ratified. The Democratic platform does not require that the term to which Mr. Wilson has been elected shall be extended.

Therefore the Senator from Montana is wholly in error with regard to his interpretation of the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania. It has nothing to do with the Democratic platform. Therefore I hope he will not be able to disturb the Democratic serenity with respect to the subject of this amendment.

I for one am in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I voted for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky simply because I believed that was the proper interpretation—that is, the real interpretation—of the amendment without his suggestion. But now that it is raised definitely and proposed to be changed by the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, I shall vote for it. I think it is fair and just.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] demands the yeas and nays upon the amendment proposed by him to the amendment of the committee.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. GALLINGER'S name was called). The present occupant of the chair is paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

Mr. GARDNER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE] to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under that arrangement, the present occupant of the chair will change his pair from the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA].

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. RICHARDSON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN]. He is detained from the Senate on account of illness. I wish that announcement to stand for the rest of the day.

The result was announced—yeas 13, nays 52, as follows:

So Mr. OLIVER'S amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, before the joint resolution passes from the Committee of the Whole, I desire to submit some observations upon the matter. I am suffering from a disability—temporary, I hope—that makes it very difficult for me to speak, and somewhat painful as well. I therefore hope that I may be permitted to say what I have to say quietly and with little interruption.

I had not intended to say anything in the nature of an extended speech, and would have adhered to that resolution, but some remarks were made yesterday that seem to call for a reply that has not yet been made. I very deeply regret that I can not concur with some of my brother Senators with whom I have been generally in absolute sympathy, and upon whose political and economic judgment I have become accustomed to rely.

I look upon this measure as a distinctly progressive proposition. This simply indicates the infinite variety of the human judgment. Some of my closest friends in the Senate apparently believe that it is an attack upon the rights, the privileges, and the power of the people. On the contrary, I believe it to be a great advance in the protection and the preservation of the rights and the privileges of the people.

I have often heard it said that there ought to be, and that eventually there will be, a line drawn between the voters of the United States upon one side of which there will align themselves the conservatives, the reactionaries, the standpatters, while upon the other there will be ranged the progressives, the radicals. I have become convinced that this line never will be drawn; because while I have been fighting, as I have assumed, for the rights of the people during a somewhat extended and somewhat stormy political career, I now find myself assigned by some of my associates to the ranks of those who are alleged to be indifferent to the rights and the privileges of the people.

I intend to prove that this is a progressive measure. I intend to prove that it is not only progressive to submit this proposition to the judgment of the people, but that it is progressive when it is considered upon its merits by the people.

The people have an absolute right to say what their Government shall be. Have I a progressive friend in the Senate who disputes that proposition? It is the fundamental, the original declaration of human rights so far as it applies to government. They have a right to say what their Government shall be.

I have no patience with that phraseology or terminology that speaks of the people in the third person. We do not give the people anything. We can not give the people anything in the way of governmental power, nor could we take away from the people anything in the way of power or privilege had it not been that years ago our forefathers provided that the people of this country should not have an opportunity to say what their Government should be until Congress opened the door to that opportunity.

I am for the referendum. I have asserted it before; I assert it now. I believe this is the best example of the referendum that the institutions of the United States can present. I am speaking now, of course, of the national institutions, the Constitution and the laws of the United States.

How is it that those who believe that the people of this country have a right to say what their Government shall be hesitate about giving them the opportunity which the adoption of this resolution would confer upon them? If there is any taking from the people power or privilege or opportunity, it is by those who refuse to give them the chance which, according to the civilized notions of modern government, they ought to have.

There are many of us who believe that the referendum should be made applicable not only to constitutions but to laws as well. I am one of them. If the legislature of a State or if the Legislature of the United States refuses to adopt legislation which the people demand, I believe that the people have a right to insist that the legislation shall be submitted to them for approval or rejection.

Just so here. It is proposed by this resolution to give the people of this country the opportunity to say what their Government shall be—to say whether they would rather have a President limited to a single term or a President eligible to successive terms. Yet it is insisted that because there is individual opinion among some Senators that if these Senators were voting in their primary capacity they would not regard this as a wise restriction to be placed on their own power as citizens, therefore they should not give the people the chance to exercise their elemental and their fundamental right.

I do not look upon the duty that we as Senators perform from that point of view. I do not believe it ought to be required that two-thirds of the Senate of the United States and two-thirds of the House of Representatives shall be completely convinced of the wisdom of a proposed amendment to the Constitution before the people shall have the opportunity to vote upon it. I believe that whenever Senators and Members of the House are convinced that a fair proportion of the people of the United States desire an opportunity to correct or to amend their fundamental law it is our duty to give them the chance to make their Government what it ought to be.

I am especially amazed at the attitude of some of my friends who have recently conducted a campaign in which the referendum bore a prominent part. It surprises me that they should here seek to close the door which this resolution would open. But I agree that before we can fairly submit an amendment of this kind to the people there must be shown a reasonable, fair demand for it. I agree that it ought not to be within the power of a single Senator to rise and say, "I think the people want this change made in their Constitution," and therefore command the support of all the Senators, without regard to their individual opinions upon the subject.

I do not assert that constitutional amendments should be submitted upon any such slender demand. But I reassert that if we believe any considerable number of the people of this country are in favor of so limiting the term of the President, and if they have expressed themselves so that they can be understood, then the man who votes against the submission of a proposed amendment to the Constitution does so in violation of the principle to which I have referred, ordinarily known as the referendum.

Let us see about this question. It has been spoken of here as though it had arisen now practically for the first time, and there had been no discussion of it throughout the years of the existence of our Government. I suppose this amendment, or the equivalent of it, has been introduced into Congress oftener than any other proposed amendment to the organic law. It has been debated more than any other amendment unless it be the amendment providing for the direct election of Senators.

I beg to read just a word indicating in a very meager way something of its history. I read from page 123 of volume 2 of the American Historical Association Report for 1896:

> Over 125 amendments have been submitted to change the term of President and fix the period of eligibility. These were brought out chiefly by the fear that the President would use the patronage of his office to secure his reelection. More than 50 of these have been propositions to fix the term at six years.

I will not pursue this comment, but will say that while the enemies of the proposition have usually been able to prevent a vote, it never has been submitted to either branch of Congress without receiving the votes of a majority of the Members of the body to which it was submitted.

I turn now to page 126, and read another extract:

> The simplest and most effective remedy would seem to be the restriction of all Presidents to a single term, a provision which the Federal convention had first unanimously adopted.

I will consider that later.

> Over 90 proposed amendments have affirmed that principle. It was presented to Congress first in 1815 as one of the amendments proposed by the Hartford convention, by the Members from Massachusetts and Connecticut, upon the instruction of their legislatures. In addition, these resolutions provided that the President should not be elected from the same State two terms in succession, thus showing New England's jealousy of Virginia.

I refer to this only to show that it is not a new subject; that it has been a matter of almost continuous demand and debate since the adoption of the Constitution.

But that is not all. Nine or ten States in the Union have, through their legislatures, at various times demanded this amendment limiting a President to a single term. I have not at hand the names of these States, nor are they material. I am simply passing through the history of the matter in order to show that we have here the firm basis of a referendum for a change in the Constitution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not sure that I understood the Senator in his statement describing the circumstances under which Congress ought to submit amendments. In view of the language of Article V of the Constitution—

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments—

I want to ask the Senator whether he means to be understood as saying that under the language "deem it necessary" it is not necessary to secure the personal approval of the Senators to the proposition, or does he construe it to mean whenever, for any reason, they deem it necessary—for instance, if they thought a considerable number of people would like to have it submitted?

Mr. CUMMINS. I construe it in the latter way. I confess I formerly held the opposite belief, before I had given the matter great thought, and before I had become impressed with the high necessity of bringing government back to the people, and giving them the full power which they ought to exercise in their own affairs. I always proceeded upon the assumption that no constitutional amendment should be submitted until it commanded the approval and had convinced the judgment of two-thirds of the Senate and two-thirds of the House. I think it is against that construction of the Constitution that a great deal of the unrest which now exists is directed. If we were to wait until two-thirds of each body were actually convinced of the necessity of a particular proposition, expressed in a particular way, we would never amend the Constitution of the United States; and the course that is being taken in this matter seems to me well adapted to establish a principle of action that will prevent the amendment of the Constitution of the country.

But I pass on to see what has been done further with regard to the movement for a single term. Three political parties have declared for this amendment. The Whig Party declared for it I think twice, certainly once. The People's Party, which was a protest against both the Democratic and the Republican Parties, declared for it, and from the platform of the People's Party, adopted at the time to which I refer, a very considerable part of the modern declarations of all existing political parties have been taken.

The People's Party organized under circumstances that are familiar to every Senator, coming directly from the body of the people themselves, declared unhesitatingly and unequivocally for a single term for President. Those earnest people did not suppose that they were organizing a raid upon their own rights and privileges. They were the advance men of their time. They were the radicals of the decade from 1880 to 1890; and while they may have been mistaken—and I am not arguing that proposition now—I do commend the declaration of the People's Party, which was really the first great protest against many of the practices and principles which we all now condemn. They insisted that the Constitution of this country should be amended so that a President should not be permitted to hold his office for more than one term; and it seems to me that such a declaration furnishes a fair basis for a referendum. Most of the friends of the referendum have stood for a plan that required the reference of a law to the action of the people in their primary capacity upon a petition signed by 8 per cent or 10 per cent or 15 per cent of the voters.

Now, tell me whether the declaration of the People's Party and the declaration of the Whig Party and finally the declaration of the Democratic Party in Baltimore last year, a party that succeeded in gathering into its following nearly 7,000,000 of the voters of the United States, should be heeded? Will anyone pretend that these accumulated demands for this change in our Constitution do not present a fair basis for submitting the question to the people themselves? So far as the referendum is concerned they who believe in it keep the word of promise to our ear and break it to our hope if they now refuse the submission of this resolution. They are doing precisely what they have charged the enemies of the doctrine with doing now these many years.

It has been constantly asserted that a few men have been able to prevent the people from remodeling their Constitution so that their powers and their privileges would be protected more adequately than they now are; and with this constant history in Congress, with the declaration of these three great parties, further proof will be added. I might add another party although the declaration is not direct. When the Progressive Party in Chicago last summer declared explicitly and emphatically for the refendum, what did it mean? Did it mean that those who happened to be for the time being acting in a representative capacity should, after they knew that a large body of their fellow men were asking an opportunity to vote upon an important, serious proposition like this, refuse to open the door simply because they themselves were not convinced of the wisdom of the course proposed?

No; I can understand perfectly how my friends here, whether of one political complexion or another, can be opposed to this amendment as citizens. I can understand that there may be a difference of opinion with regard to the wisdom of limiting a President to a single term, for that is a question the debate upon which began when the Constitutional Convention met in 1787 and it has continued until the present time, I know there is a wide variety of judgment respecting it. But how, in view of what I have said, those who are in favor of an enlargement of the rights of the people, in favor of giving them at every fair opportunity the privilege of declaring what their Government ought to be and what their Constitution ought to be, can vote to refuse a submission of a proposal of this kind I am utterly unable to understand.

But I will add a little more to this volume of demand, because a demand of this sort is cumulative in its character. At the time of the formation of the Constitution, Thomas Jefferson was for the single term; Alexander Hamilton was against it. I wonder if those who are now considering the matter from the standpoint of the rights and the powers of the people and their influence in public affairs think that Alexander Hamilton was more profoundly interested and concerned for the people than was Thomas Jefferson. Alexander Hamilton believed, as we all know, in a President elected during good behavior, and when he failed in that he desired, of course, as much permanency as possible in the presidential office. He was patriotic and sincere; but I think it can not be said, at least, that those of us who prefer to follow the teachings of Thomas Jefferson are any the less the friends of the people.

It has been said that a great controversy arose over it about the close of Andrew Jackson's term; and that is true. But Andrew Jackson was in favor of this proposition. Daniel Webster was in favor of it, because he explicitly affirmed the Whig platform that contained a limitation immediately after its adoption, I think, in 1840. Henry Clay was in favor of a single term; Charles Sumner was in favor of a single term.

I listened the other day with a good deal of interest to the development of this subject by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and I could but remember the attitude which Charles Sumner had assumed upon the same great problem, and he did not assume it because he was opposed to Gen. Grant having a third term. I know that a great deal of literature upon this subject accumulated while Gen. Grant was a candidate for a third term, but the controversy in Congress did not occur solely at that time.

Charles Sumner in 1871, before the expiration of Grant's first term, presented a resolution upon this subject, and I intend to ask the consent of the Senate that the resolution he then offered shall be read, because it describes so well the difference between the opinion of the then Senator from Massachusetts and the present Senator from Massachusetts that I think it will be both instructive and interesting, and aside from that it contains a review of the whole subject up to that time. I ask that the Secretary read from the words "Joint resolution proposing an amendment of the Constitution, confining the President to one term," on page 321 of the volume I send to the desk, to the end of the resolution, on page 326.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment of the Constitution confining the President to one term.

Whereas for many years there has been an increasing conviction among the people, without distinction of party, that one wielding the cast patronage of the President should not be a candidate for reelection, and this conviction has found expression in the solemn warnings of illustrious citizens, and in repeated propostions for an amendment of the Constitution confining the President to one term.

Whereas Andrew Jackson was so fully impressed by the peril to republican institutions from the temptations acting on a President, who, wielding the cast patronage of his office, is a candidate for relection, that in his first annual message he called attention to it; that in his second annual message, after setting forth the design of the Constitution "to secure the independence of each department of the Government and promote the healthful and equitable administration of all the trusts which it has created," he did not hesitate to say, "The agent most likely to contravene this design of the Constitution is the Chief Magistrate," and then proceeded to declare, "In order particularly that his appointment may as far as possible be placed beyond the reach of any improper influences, in order that he may approach the solemn responsibilities of the highest office in the gift of a free people uncommitted to any other course than the strict line of constitutional duty, and that the securities for this independence may be rendered as strong as the nature of power and the weakness of its possessor will admit, I can not too earnestly invite your attention to the propriety of promoting such an amendment to the Constitution as will render him ineligible after one term of service." And then again, in his third annual message, the same President renewed his patriotic appeal.

Whereas William Henry Harrison, following in the footsteps of Andrew Jackson, felt it a primary duty, in accepting his nomination as President, to assert the one-term principle in these explicit words: "Among the principles proper to be adopted by any Executive sincerely desirous to restore the administration to its original simplicity and purity, I deem the following to be of prominent importance: First, to confine his service to a single term"; and then, in public speech during the canvass which ended in his election, declared, "If the privilege of being President of the Untied States had been limited to one term the incumbent would devote all his time to the public interest, and there would be no cause to misrule the country"; and he concluded by pledging himself "before Heaven and earth, if elected President of these Untied States, to lay down, at the end of the term, faithfully, that high trust at the feet of the people."

Whereas Henry Clay, though differing much from Andrew Jackson, united with him on the one-term principle and publicly enforced it in a speech June 27, 1840, where, after asking for "a provision to render a person ineligible to the office of President of the United States after a service of one term," he explained the necessity of the amendment by saying: "Much observation and deliberate reflection have satisfied me that too much of the time, the thoughts, and the exertions of the incumbent are occupied during his first term in securing his reelection; the public busniess consequently suffers." And then again, in a letter dated September 13, 1842, while setting forth what he calls "principal objects engaging the common desire and the common exertion of the Whig Party," the same statesman specifies "an amendment of the Constitution limiting the incumbent of the presidential office to a single term."

Whereas the Whig Party in its national convention at Baltimore, May 1, 1844, nominated Henry Clay as President and Theodore Frelinghuysen as Vice President, with a platform where "a single term for the Presidency" is declared to be among "the great principles of the Whig Party, principles inseparable from the public honor and prosperity, to be maintained and advanced by the election of these candidates," which declaration was echoed at the great national ratification convention the next day, addressed by Daniel Webster, where it was resolved that "the limitation of a President to a single term" was among the objects "for which the Whig Party will unceasingly strive until their efforts are crowned with a single and triumphant success";

Whereas, in the same spirit and in harmony with these authorities, another statesman, Benjamin F. Wade, at the close of his long service in the Senate, most earnestly urged an amendment of the Constitution confining the President to one term, and in his speech on that occasion, February 20, 1866, said, "The offering of this resolution is no new impulse of mine, for I have been an advocate of the principle contained in it for many years, and I have derived the strong impressions which I entertain on the subject from a very careful observation of the workings of our Government during the period that I have been an observer of them; I believe it has been very rare that we have been able to elect a President of the United States who has not been tempted to use the vast powers intrusted to him according to his own opinions to advance his reelection"; and then, after exposing at length the necessity of this amendment, the veteran Senator further declared, "There are defects in the Constitution, and this is among the most glaring; all men have seen it; and now let us have the nerve, let us have the resolution, to come up and apply the remedy";

Whereas these testimonies, revealing intense and widespread convictions of the American people, are reenforced by the friendly observations of De Tocqueville, the remarkable Frenchman to whom our country is under such great and lasting obligations, in his famous work on "Democracy in America," where he says, in words of singular clearness and force, "Intrigue and corruption are vices natural to elective governments; but when the chief of the state can be reelected, the vices extend themselves indefinitely and compromise the very existence of the country; when a simple candidate seeks success by intrigue his maneuvers can operate only over a circumscribed space; when, on the contrary, the chief of the state himself enters the list he borrows for his own use the force of the government; in the first case it is a man with his feeble means; in the second it is the state itself, with its immense resources, that intrigues and corrupts"; and then, again, the same great writer, who had studied our country so closely, testified, "It is impossible to consider the ordinary course of affairs in the United States without perceiving that the desire of the reelected dominates the thoughts of the President; that the whole policy of his administration tends toward this point; that his least movements are made subservient of this object; that, especially as the moment of crisis approaches, individual interest substitutes itself in his mind for the general interest";

Whereas all these concurring voices where patriotism, experience, and reason bear testimony have additional value at a moment when the country is looking anxiously to a reform of the civil service, for the plain reason that the peril from the Chief Magistrate so long as he is exposed to temptation surpasses that from any other quarter, and thus the first stage of this much-desired reform is the one-term principle, to the end that the President, who exercises the appointing power, reaching into all parts of the country and holding in subserviency a multitudinous army of officeholders, shall be absolutely without motive or inducement to employ it for any other purpose than the public good; and

Whereas the character of republican institutions requires that the Chief Magistrate shall be above all suspicion of using the machinery of which he is the official head to promote his own personal aims: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as parts of the Constitution, to wit:

ARTICLE.

SECTION 1. No person who has once held the office of President of the United States shall be thereafter eligible to that office.

SEC. 2. This amendment shall not take effect until after the 4th day of March, 1873.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE GEORGE S. LEGARE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. S. South, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. GEORGE S. LEGARE, late a Representative from the State of South Carolina, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 31, 1913.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. GEORGE S. LEGARE, a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That a committee of 16 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I submit the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask for their adoption.

The resolutions (S. Res. 445) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. GEORGE S. LEGARE, late a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That a committee of nine Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate pro tempore, to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to attend the funeral of the deceased, at Charleston, S. C.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed, under the second resolution, as the committee on the part of the Senate, Mr. TILLMAN, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. PERKY, Mr. MYERS, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. CRAWFORD, and Mr. POINDEXTER.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I move, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative, that the Senate take a recess until 11.45 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, February 1, 1913, at 11.45 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 31, 1913.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Once more, Almighty God, our Father, we are brought face to face with the inevitable in the death of another Member of this House. Increase our faith in the immutability of Thy character and in the prolongation of life, that we may be comforted with his dear ones in the overruling of Thy providence for the eternal and everlasting good of Thy children. And help us to be ready when the summons comes that we may pass serenely on to the larger life. And Thine be the praise in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (H. R. 19115) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. This bill is what is commonly called the omnibus war-claims bill. I desire to state to the Members of the House who have claims in this bill and are interested in it, that I put in every available moment of the extra session working on the items that composed the bill and therefore obtained an early report. The bill was taken up and passed in the House at a very early period of the regular session. It went to the Senate and was not passed by the Senate until the 21st day of January, 1913. As soon as the bill came back to the House, I first asked the Speaker to let it remain upon the Speaker's table and then made a request for unanimous consent to take the bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. That request was objected to, and the bill then had to go to the Committee on War Claims. The committee was called together immediately and reported the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the Senate amendments be disagreed to and the conference asked by the Senate agreed to. To-day is the day on which the Private Calendar can be considered by the House, provided a preferential motion to go into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the District appropriation bill is voted down. Then after we have gone into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the omnibus war-claims bill, and the committee has taken up this bill, it can be considered. The bill is 278 pages long. It will be utterly impossible to have anything like a conference upon this bill which I could ask the House to accept, if it is not sent to conference immediately. Under the ordinary rules of the House, without the slightest effort to filibuster, it will be impossible in one day to vote on the 233 numbered Senate amendments, many of which are divisible and upon which many votes can be demanded. But I realize, and I realized yesterday, that it would be utterly impossible, even though we used the whole of to-day, to get this bill acted upon and sent to conference.

I simply desire to let the House know the situation. As I understand, the House has agreed to take up for consideration to-day the District appropriation bill, and I hope that my request will be granted. I desire to say to anyone who is disposed to object, that no bill will be reported back from conference upon which any gentleman will not be satisfied an honest effort was made on the part of the conferees to discharge their duties to this House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman how many items were in the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. SIMS. There were about 1,080 separate claims. That is my recollection.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the Senate, by amendment, struck out 982 of those——

Mr. SIMS. Practically all of them.

Mr. MANN (continuing). And added 15 items under the war claims provision, and in addition to that it added some 1,600 items of claims over which the Committee on War Claims has no jurisdiction.

Mr. SIMS. As to the number I do not know, but the gentleman is right as to the latter part of his statement, beyond any question. Personally I have not counted the number.

Mr. MANN. There are over 1,600, I believe, or about 1,600. There are 1,230 overtime navy-yard claims, 278 naval claims for additional pay on account of service at sea, 94 navy and war claims, longevity and extra pay, and 9 miscellaneous claims added by the Senate. The committee, of course, has probably no special knowledge concerning these claims, which have not been pending before the House, and which if pending before the House would be before the Committee on Claims instead of the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. SIMS. That is undoubtedly correct.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman himself believe that it would be quite fair to the House or even to the conferees of the House to send to a conference now a bill where the Senate has stricken out practically all of the items which were inserted by the House concerning war claims and have added 1,600 items over which the committee has no jurisdiction, to send those to conference where the plain intention—I will not say intention—but the plain effort would be to bring about a compromise by accepting all the claims which the House had proposed and the Senate had stricken out and all the claims which the Senate now proposes in addition to those that the House passed before. The gentleman knows the pressure that comes to the conferees from Members of the House having some claim that some constituent is writing him about, and the gentleman knows the moment this bill would go to conference the claim agents and the claim attorneys who are interested in these claims would see that every claimant would at once communicate with the Members of Congress from their respective districts urging them to urge the conferees to agree to the conference report and take care of their special claims.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. I have the greatest confidence in the gentleman from Tennessee and the other conferees who would be appointed by the House, but personally I would not subject myself to that pressure under any condition if I were even as hard-hearted about some things as the gentleman from Tennessee——

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me in his time, if the gentleman is going to object, in which to suggest that I realize the difficulty that confronts the conferees in the discharge of their duties, especially the conferees on a bill coming from the Committee on Claims or War Claims. The gentleman very correctly says we have no special knowledge of these claims. Most of them are in classes, and I admit that it would be exceedingly difficult, and it might turn out that we could not come to any agreement at all, but I would ask the gentleman from Illinois if it is within the purview of duty that a chairman of a committee should dodge responsibility and not make every effort he can to discharge that duty to the utmost?

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Tennessee is performing his function properly in seeking to have this bill sent to conference, but here, for instance, is a claim for increased pay on account of longevity service based upon a statute passed in 1838 by one of those who received the pay, and the Government construed it one way until the Supreme Court decided otherwise in 1881, and claims are allowed in this bill dating back from 1838 to officers who died in the forties and fifties before the war on the ground that their longevity pay should have commenced with their entrance into the Military or Naval Academy instead of their actual entrance into the service of the Government in the Army and Navy as commissioned officers, and this bill contains a general provision waiving the statute of limitations as to every officer of the Army and the Navy from 1838 down to the time when this longevity pay was allowed, although all the officers received their pay and were satisfied with their pay in the service of the Government. And no one knows, and no one has made a computation to estimate the amount of money which would be involved by that.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman will remember that I stood here and fought at the risk of defeating an entire omnibus bill, what was called the Selfridge board claims, when every pressure, and even threats, were brought to bear upon me; and I stood to the last and defeated those claims. Now, I promise I will stand against any claim in this bill regardless of pressure that can be brought until I am shown it is right and ought to be paid.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is one of the most popular and able and honest Members of this House. I should dislike very much to see the gentleman made unpopular in the House by resisting all of these claims from half or three-fourths or four-fifths of the Members of Congress going to him at the request of their constituents. I wish to preserve the popularity of my friend for him.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] just one question. We will take what he says as being correct. Under existing circumstances, with an objection to this request, will it be practically possible to get this bill to conference except by a special rule providing for a vote upon the naked question of disagreement of Senate amendments and for a conference?

Mr. MANN. I do not know about that. I would not wish to say. I am willing to cooperate with the gentleman from Tennessee in having these war claims paid now or hereafter; but it seems to me that the distinguished body at the other end of the Capitol ought to be courteous enough with the body at this end of the Capitol to not insert into the war-claims bill, which comes from one committee of this House, other matters which in this House belong to another committee. For instance, we have two pension committees of the House, one relating to pensions for survivors of the Civil War, one relating to pensions for officers or men concerned with other wars or the Regular Army. The Senate has one pension committee, and yet they never mix the two propositions, because they recognize in the Pension Committee in the Senate that the House has two pension committees, and they never insert in a bill that comes from the Invalid Pensions Committee of the House a proposition that belongs to the Pensions Committee of the House, or vice versa. They had best take that into consideration on the claims bill, then there will be no trouble in passing a proper claims bill in the House. But to think of inserting 1,600 claims in a bill from the War Claims Committee, the jurisdiction over those bills pertaining to the Claims Committee, and then ask to have three members of the War Claims Committee pass upon those in conference is the height of bad legislation.

Mr. SIMS. And the gentleman, of course, must know that we are powerless to prevent that.

Mr. MANN. I am addressing my remarks to the House, with the hope that they will be considered elsewhere.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House, the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 28499, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RODDENBERY] will take the chair.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Plumbing inspection division: Inspector of plumbing, $2,000; principal assistant inspector of plumbing, $1,550; assistant inspectors of plumbing—1 at $1,200, 4 at $1,000 each; clerks—1 at $1,200, 1 at $900; temporary employment of additional assistant inspectors of plumbing and laborers for such time as their services may be necessary, $1,700; draftsman, $1,350; sewer tapper, $1,000; 3 members of the plumbing board, at $150 each.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order as to that item, and, without repeating or reiterating, I present the same reasons that I did yesterday, that it is simply the payment of a private claim when it comes to reimbursing an individual for property owned by himself and not by the Government.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I concede the point is well taken, and I offer the following amendment:

Insert, after the semicolon, in line 2, the following:
"The three assistant inspectors of plumbing, for the provision and maintenance by themselves of three motor cycles for use in their official inspection in the District of Columbia, $10 per month each, $360."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 2, after the word "each," insert the following:
"The three assistant inspectors of plumbing, for the provision and maintenance by themselves of three motor cycles for use in their official inspections in the District of Columbia, $10 per month each, $360."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I must insist there is not a particle of difference between the amendment and the other, and I make the point of order on it, because it is exactly the same proposition, inasmuch as it is the private debts of an individual concerning private property and not public property.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest a most essential difference between the two propositions. We discussed this principle on yesterday in another connection. It is well to have a settlement of the matter before proceeding further.

This is the difference between the matter in the bill, and the matter of the amendment. So far as the language of the bill is concerned, the word "reimbursed," might be considered as indicating payment to some one having a claim against the District, by reason of money paid, or services rendered. But to appropriate directly in advance, or even after the use of these machines, certainly can not in any sense be considered as payment of a private claim. No claim against the District, or the Government ever arises in connection with these machines. Their use as private property by the owners, can not be made the basis of a claim.

It might as well be contended that if we appropriate, as we do, for the street-car fares of certain officials of the District, such an appropriation is the payment of a private claim, or that if we appropriate for transportation of any sort for any officer in connection with the discharge of the duties of his office, a claim is thereby discharged.

I submit these further arguments to the Chair, calling attention as well in this connection to what appears in the RECORD of yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to inquire in respect to the salaries of these assistant inspectors of plumbing, fixed by statute, as the gentleman describes. If a motion were made to increase the salary by $10 a month, or $120 a year, and a point of order were made, the point might probably be sustained because it was an increase of the salary. Now, if these are privately owned vehicles and are used by these officials in connection with the labor or service they are designated to render, and by this amendment a particular amount per month is paid to a particular employee or a particular class of employees, how does it escape the objection of being in effect an increase of salary for that year?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Of course it might be argued that indirectly, when transportation is provided for, the salary is increased. But it is not so regarded. It is an appropriation which is authorized, whatever may be its incidental effect upon the officer. It might not affect the salary at all, as the officer might walk if transportation is not provided, thereby reducing his efficiency, but leaving the salary intact. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to some precedents in connection with this matter. While it is true that an increase in a salary carried in an appropriation bill of the preceding year, is subject to a point of order, on the ground that it changes existing law, yet the Chair will find on looking into the matter—and I have a memorandum of the reference on my desk—that this holding is an exception, and admitted to be an exception to the general rule.

The Chair will find that Chairmen in ruling on this very proposition, announce that if an opportunity was given to rule upon the same as an original proposition, they would not sustain it. There is no foundation of reason for this ruling. It is one of mere convenience.

I admit of course that these precedents exist, and that an increase of the salaries of officials who are carried at other salaries in the last appropriation bill is subject to a point of order. But that ruling rests, as I have said, on no foundation of reason. It is admitted to be an exception, and one unsupported by principle. If offered as an original proposition I have no doubt that the present occupant of the chair would decide that the point of order was not well taken.

This being so, there is no reason why the Chair should undertake to extend the application of this precedent to a situation like this, when such an application would tend to cripple the operations of the District government. In the discharge of their duties these men are rendered more efficient by the use of these instrumentalities. This appropriation is really an economy, because it enables one official to do the work possibly of one and one-half, or two officials. I put this matter on a broader basis than one of salary, and assert that it is an appropriation for the proper operation of a government which we have created, and for which we appropriate.

Mr. FRANCIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. FRANCIS. Is not the same true with regard to the rural-route carriers throughout the country—the efficiency of their service is facilitated by reason of conveyances beyond the amount of the salary appropriated for them?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes. But this is not a question of law, but one that addresses itself to the discretion of the committee. It is perfectly competent for the committee to strike out this item.

Mr. FRANCIS. In the enactment of the original bill was it not contemplated that the parties receiving this salary should make these inspections and do this work? Was it not contemplated by the original act that this service should be rendered?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, certainly it was.

Mr. FRANCIS. Then why allow the extra compensation for it?

Mr. SAUNDERS. It is not an extra compensation, except in an indirect way. It may not be, as I have shown any increase at all, even indirectly. But I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that on account of the increase of population, and business in this city, the number of these inspections has greatly increased. Hence a different situation from the former one, is presented. If you do not provide these instrumentalities, it will be necessary to provide more officials. If it is considered to be unwise to provide for this transportation, then strike this item out of the bill. But in the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations that action would be a mistake. The situation is up to the Committee of the Whole.

If it is considered an unwise appropriation to provide that one man, by the use of a motor cycle, can do the work of two, then strike out the provision for a motor cycle. It is perfectly competent for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FRANCIS] to make that motion. I will not become involved in any controversy about the rural carriers, or any other officials of the Government. I am simply submitting to the Chair that in connection with the government of this city, the committee is authorized to provide those instrumentalities, for its officials, which make for the economical government of the city by rendering the work of a given number of officials more efficient, and that such a provision is not subject to a point of order. If it was proposed to increase the salary of an official, from a present salary of $50 a month to one of $60, it is freely admitted that this increase would be subject to a point of order, but as heretofore pointed out, the precedents sustaining this point of order, are admittedly exceptions to the general rule, and preceding occupants of the chair following these precedents have said that they merely followed those decisions, though they regarded them as erroneous. That being so, why should the application of a ruling which can not be supported upon principle, be extended to a proposition like the pending one? I submit the matter to the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, one word in addition to what has been said by the gentleman from Virginia. This can not in any sense be called an increase in the salaries paid these additional employees. It is appropriating a sum of money to furnish the means whereby they may properly discharge the duties imposed upon them, to afford a facility for the more expeditious performance of their duty, and it is in no sense an augmentation of their salary and is not intended as such.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen in charge of this bill admit that the item as it now appears in the bill is for the reimbursement or payment of a private claim. Therefore it is subject to a point of order. They take the anomalous position, however, that to pay a private claim after it has been incurred is subject to a point of order, but to pay a private claim before it is incurred is not subject to a point of order. Instead of being a better position, it is a more untenable position. But, in addition to agreeing to pay a private claim before it is incurred, the effect of it, plainly put, is to increase a salary. So, Mr. Chairman, upon the two points I insist upon my point of order.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, before you rule, may I submit to you the authorities I referred to in connection with this proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The section in Hinds' Precedents reads as follows:

> In the absence of a general law fixing a salary, the amount appropriated in the last appropriation bill has been held to be the legal salary, although in violation of the general rule that the appropriation bill makes law only for the year.

That is on page 453 of volume 4 of Hinds' Precedents. Then on page 455 we find this ruling of the Chair. I referred to this before, and now simply wish to put the matter before the Chairman in an authoritative form:

> The Chair can not refrain from saying that if this question were presented for the first time—

That was an amendment increasing a salary over that carried in the last appropriation bill—

> he would have no hestitation in ruling the amendment to be in order; but to carry out in that way the conviction of the Chair might overturn the whole appropriation bill, or so large a portion of it as to render it inoperative. The Chair therefore takes the opportunity to shield himself behind the decisions which have been heretofore made and sustains the point of order.

I say that such a precedent as this, standing as it does, with no principle behind it, ought not to be relied upon, or strained in order to meet a situation like the present, which is in no way its analogue.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, there is no authority that anyone can find which will authorize anybody to incur a private claim and then agree in advance to pay it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this is in no sense a private claim. I do not understand that anyone has conceded that this is to pay a private claim. It would be perfectly competent on this bill to provide means of transportation for these officials, whether by automobiles or motor-propelled vehicles, either by purchase of them or by the hire of them, and the purpose of this provision is not to discharge a private claim, but in effect to obtain means of transportation by hiring the vehicles from the persons owning them who happen to be in the service of the District.

Under the ruling that certain facilities can be furnished upon these bills for the necessary transaction of public business in the District, this is one of the facilities that can be carried. Otherwise the rules of the House of Representatives are different from what anyone ever conceived them to be. If nothing can be done on an appropriation bill under the various statutes providing for the existence of the government of the District of Columbia and its maintenance except something that has been done in the past, it is idle to attempt to provide for the maintenance of a government in a municipality where the details of the appropriations must be modified from time to time to meet the varying conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. In the language of this amendment, "to three assistant inspectors of plumbing for the provision and maintenance by themselves of three motor cycles," and so forth; does the gentleman understand that the words "the provision" might be construed that the motor cycle shall be used by the inspector for the purpose and also that it might be by the inspector bought from that sum, in part or in whole, which motor cycle shall afterwards be his individual property? That question was not raised on yesterday, but I suggest it to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Texas will yield, it seems to me that the language simply means that these inspectors shall have provided themselves with motor cycles and maintained them. While the language says "to reimburse three assistant inspectors," I think we all understand that this is not a claims bill. Take any item in any bill for traveling expenses; here are post-office inspectors of no value unless they can travel, and their salaries do not cover the traveling expenses, and could not, but we provide every year for the amount which may be used for transportation of these post-office inspectors at a rate to be fixed, usually not exceeding so much. These expenses are first incurred by the inspectors. They spend the money before they get it. They are reimbursed on vouchers which they present.

In the same way these inspectors of plumbing, in order to get the best efficiency, are required to move around the District of Columbia by the aid of some method of rapid transportation, and the best, fastest, and cheapest method of transportation is by motor cycle. Having gone to the expense of providing themselves with motor cycles and maintaining these motor cycles, we, in fact, make an appropriation and then limit the amount which they can be paid for their transportation. It would undoubtedly be in order to provide street car fare for them as we provide railroad fare for inspectors who are required to go out of the city. If you have inspectors, it is necessary to have tools with which they can work, and among the tools with which they work is the means of moving around the city rapidly. The inspector who had to walk would find it a slow method of inspection. The District government might permit him to hire a carriage or a wagon with which to go around, but that is slow and costly. Now, here the provision is to provide traveling expenses. They can not get this in advance. They do not draw the money in advance for the succeeding month, but it is to reimburse them after they have gone to the expense.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair ask a similar question to that propounded to the gentleman from New York. In line 4, suppose the words "and maintenance" were eliminated. Then it would read: "To three inspectors of plumbing for the provision by themselves of three motor cycles for use," and so forth. What would be the import of the words "the provision"?

Mr. MANN. Suppose you left that out and provided for maintenance of the motor cycles. They might possibly draw the money then for the maintenance without having them, but this provision "for the provision and maintenance" requires them to have the motor cycles before they can draw the money. They must, before drawing the money, have provided themselves with motor cycles. They do not buy the motor cycles out of this fund.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it is the claim of the gentleman that the words "the provision" constitute one of the objects for which the allowance is made, the statement indicating that before the maintenance shall be allowed they must have themselves made the provision?

Mr. MANN. They must have themselves made the provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask what construction the chairman of the committee puts upon that proposition?

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I think the words "for the provision" mean that during the period of time that this $10 a month is allowed it is not only to maintain the motor cycle, but also to accumulate a fund with which to purchase another when the one being used has worn out.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois has made a rather ingenious argument, and yet is full of fallacy. He has cited the instance of a post-office inspector traveling. Let us take that. Let us suppose that the post-office inspector travels upon a railroad. Could there be put into this bill a provision to pay the railroad for the damage which that post-office inspector might do to the seat of the railroad train? Is not that a similar proposition to this? Mr. Chairman, the further they go with their argument from this point the more apparent it becomes that it at last is a private claim which it is endeavored to pay out of a public fund in an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the point of order is not well taken, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the amendment, insert the following:
"Provided That no more of said sum shall be expended than is actually necessary for the maintenance of said motor cycle."

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I will accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now on is on the adoption of the amendment as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Care of District building: Clerk and stenographer, $2,000; chief engineer, $1,400; 3 assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; electrician, $1,200; 2 dynamo tenders, at $875 each; 3 firemen, at $720 each; 3 coal passers, at $600 each; electrician's helper, $840; 8 elevator conductors, at $600 each; laborers—2 at $660 each, 2 at $500 each; 2 chief cleaners, who shall also have charge of the lavatories, at $500 each; 30 cleaners, at $240 each; chief watchman, $1,000; assistant chief watchman, $660; 8 watchmen, at $600 each; pneumatic-tube operator, $600; in all, $36,530: Provided, That the employees herein authorized for the care of the District building shall be appointed by the assistants to the engineer commissioner, with the approval of the commissioners.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to the paragraph for the reason that it contains new legislation. My point is directly aimed at line 18, where there is the following provision:

Provided, That the employees herein authorized for the care of the District building shall be appointed by the assistants to the Engineer Commissioner, with the approval of the commissioners.

That is legislation taking away from the commissioners the power to make that appointment. There is scramble enough now over appointments, trying to hide them away so that they can not be taken advantage of after the 4th of March, and I wish to stop this.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the Chair that this is, word for word, the paragraph as it has been carried in this bill for a number of years. There is nothing new in the item; the proviso is a limitation on the appropriation made. It directs the commissioners to do certain things in connection with the employment of the officials provided for.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman does not contend that the fact of its having been carried in an appropriation bill will give it any better standing if it is not provided for by law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I will say right there that it was not in the last appropriation bill, according to my recollection.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes; it was.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But it does not make any difference whether it was or was not. I do not think it was there.

Mr. BURLESON. I am quite sure it was in the last appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does not the organic act provide that these employees shall be appointed by the commissioners?

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand the last District appropriation act passed by Congress, and it contains this proviso, word for word.

The CHAIRMAN. What authority of law is there for conferring upon the assistant engineers the power of the appointment of these employees?

Mr. BURLESON. I do not think that there is any specific authority.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, does not the organic act particularly provide that they shall be appointed by the commissioners?

Mr. BURLESON. But the Chair will note that it is to be done with the approval of the commissioners.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; and the President must appoint, subject to the approval of the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of any specific authority upon the subject, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: After the colon, on page 4, line 18, add the following: "Provided, That the employees herein authorized to take care of the District building shall be appointed by the commissioners."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 18, after the colon, add the following:
"Provided, That the employees herein authorized to take care of the District building shall be appointed by the commissioners."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Read that again, please.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, this carries no authorization; there is no "herein authorized," and I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], relative to the $240 each, which is provided in line 15, for pay of charwomen. I desire to know whether he thinks that is the correct figure or not that they should be paid?

Mr. BURLESON. The gentleman means whether it is adequate compensation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; or inadequate.

Mr. BURLESON. I think it is adequate compensation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will ask the gentleman from Texas to turn to page 13, line 9, where provision is made to pay the charwomen in the library $180 each per year.

Mr. BURLESON. I will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that the hours of service of these charwomen may differ and do differ in the various buildings. A charwoman is not continuously employed——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I understand that.

Mr. BURLESON. She serves the District only an hour and a half or two hours or two hours and a half a day, and there is the greatest demand for those places. It is universally regarded in the city as adequate compensation for the services rendered. It is higher pay than is given to charwomen who are engaged by the owners of the large office buildings in the city, and I assure the gentleman that there is no disposition on the part of those in charge of the bill to give inadequate compensation to any person serving the District government. We have not the slightest doubt in our minds that this is liberal compensation for the services rendered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I was addressing myself to the subject of discrimination. For the Takoma Park Library 6 charwomen are provided for, to be paid $180 a year; for the Municipal Building 30 charwomen are provided for, to be paid $240 a year. Now, it is inevitable that either one is paid too much or the other is paid too little.

Mr. FOSTER. Not necessarily.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is necessarily, because it takes 6 charwomen just as long to clean the public library building as it takes 30 to clean the Municipal Building.

Mr. FOSTER. How does the gentleman know that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. How does the gentleman know the contrary?

Mr. FOSTER. I am asking for information; the gentleman is giving information, and I would like to know where he gets it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think the committee——

Mr. FOSTER. To say it takes as long to clean in one place as another, the gentleman must have some reason for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is exactly what the gentleman from Kentucky is relying upon—reason for it.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, give it to us; let us know what it is.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Use your reason and I am quite sure the gentleman from Kentucky will have it.

Mr. FOSTER. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that he does not give any reason for it. He states now it might take as long to clean a certain building as another and——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I asked the question, Why the reason for the discrimination?

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman made the statement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Now, I am asked in turn to show their proposition is correct.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman may be right; I am asking him to give some reason for it, that is all; I do not know; I am not denying the gentleman's statement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "$240," in line 15, and insert "$180."

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky moved first to strike out the last word. Does he withdraw that amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I withdraw the pro forma amendment and move to strike out "$240" and insert "$180" and pay all these alike.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 15, strike out the figures "$240" and insert in lieu thereof "$180."

Mr. BURLESON. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. BUTLER. Is that the charwoman amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. COX. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I demand a division.

Mr. MANN. Which amendment was to be voted on?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], to strike out "$240" and insert "$180," and the Chair has announced that the noes seem to have it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 1, noes 22.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask for information as to what was done with lines 18, 19, 20, and 21.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was sustained as made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] on the proviso beginning in line 18. Thereafter the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] moved an amendment. A point of order was made against it by the gentleman from Kentucky and overruled. The amendment was then submitted to the committee and the committee adopted it. The Clerk will read.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph, for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the subcommittee as to what provisions are made for these charwomen in the discharge of their duties in cleaning the District building.

Mr. BURLESON. All the appliances and all the materials used for cleaning purposes are supplied by the District government. The only service that is rendered by these charwomen is to report to the building at a certain time after office hours, and to remain there, in some instances, two, three, or three and one-half hours and clean the building.

Mr. FOWLER. What is the average length of time which is required to clean the building?

Mr. BURLESON. Do you mean the Municipal Building?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. I am not sure. I think probably it may be from two to three and one-half hours a day.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, are these women required to get down on their hands and knees and scrub and mop the floor of this building?

Mr. BURLESON. I have never been in the District building while it was being cleaned, and I do not know what particular rules and regulations about requiring them to get on their hands and knees have been adopted by those who have charge of the cleaning of the building, but I am satisfied that such regulations are adopted as will accomplish the result desired, which is a proper cleaning of the building.

Mr. FOWLER. I submit that there ought to be a proper sanitary cleaning, but could not that be done by the use of mops and scrub brushes such as would prevent the women from having to get down on their hands and knees to do this work?

Mr. BURLESON. If I made myself clear, I did not say that they got down on their hands and knees. I informed the gentleman I did not know whether they got down on their hands and knees or not, but I feel quite sure that all proper appliances are furnished to these charwomen. It may be they have vacuum cleaners for all I know, it may be they have mops with handles sufficiently long to permit them to maintain an erect position at all times. I am not sure about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. I move to strike out the last three words, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not entertain that motion, it being a pro forma motion, and the gentleman having been already recognized for five minutes on a pro forma motion.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to withdraw the pro forma amendment, and then move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the motion the gentleman originally made?

Mr. FOWLER. I ask unanimous consent for the purpose of inquiring into this important question.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. For how long?

Mr. FOWLER. Five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOWLER. Did your committee make inquiry as to the method and appliances furnished to these charwomen for the cleaning of this building?

Mr. BURLESON. We did not. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I am satisfied that the means utilized for the cleaning of the Municipal Building are identical with the means utilized for cleaning the Office Building, where you go every day and where you are compelled to see how the cleaning is effected.

Mr. COX. They use the same means that our wives employ in our homes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, that it just the reason why I am inquiring of the distinguished gentleman, so that I may know as to whether or not these women are required to get down on their hands and knees for the purpose of scrubbing, mopping, and cleaning the floors of this building.

Mr. Chairman, I know that these women are so poor that they will endure whatever indignities are put upon them in doing this menial work. Their wants for the necessaries of life are so great that they do not dare to make known their grievances for fear of losing their jobs. I know, from the statement of a woman employed in the House Office Building, who, because she was required to get down on her hands and knees and crawl over the hard stone floor, had inflicted bruises upon her knees which have not yet healed, and she has not made it known to the public because she is afraid that by so doing she will lose her job. I can not name her in this reference without endangering her employment, as she believes.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that a complete and sanitary condition could be brought about in this and other public buildings by furnishing these charwomen with mops and scrubbing brushes with handles, whereby the work could be done by them while standing instead of crawling on their hands and knees. These poor, helpless women who are required to do for the District of Columbia and the United States of America work such as will bring upon their persons bruises and sores which they are compelled to endure for fear of losing their jobs should be speedily relieved by Congress. I insist, Mr. Chairman, that such a condition is a disgrace to the authority that makes the employment, I care not what that authority is. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would not have adverted to this matter had it not been for that sickening and sad story that was told to me a few days ago by this poor charwoman in the House Office Building, a building controlled by Congress and by the laws that Congress enacts. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that Congress will tolerate it no more. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CANNON. I know the kindly heart of my colleague [Mr. FOWLER], and I know his desire, in season and, I think, sometimes out of season, to be the champion of the oppressed. I know another thing—a fact which, I think, is shared in the experience of every Member of Congress—that many, many times in the course of a month people, by letter, in the District of Columbia—women, sometimes in person, sometimes by letter, sometimes pastors of churches, sometimes well-disposed people in other avocations—are making recommendations to secure employment for women as charwomen.

I made some inquiry about it some years ago. The hours generally are about two hours a day, generally from 5 o'clock to 7 in the evening, or perhaps from 4 to 6 o'clock in some of the departments. For the two hours' labor about 75 cents is paid. In the main women who have to work for a living, frequently women with families, seek this employment. It may be from my colleague's standpoint that they ought to have, instead of 75 cents, $1, or $2, or $3. As it is, the compensation runs to about $240 a year.

Take the House Office Building. We come pretty nearly having constant sessions of Congress. It is harder on the charwomen during the sessions than it is during the vacation. I apprehend possibly that for the service rendered the places are greatly sought after. Of course we have with us always people who have to earn their own living. We have nearly 100,000,000 people in the United States. My colleague and myself have had the experience—I am older than he—of working at $6 a month on the farm, in the harvest field. I did that, after I was big enough to do a man's work, at 75 cents a day. After all, matter is made to assume shape useful to the human family by means of labor, and in the last analysis all things are charged over on production—production by manual toil, production by use of the brain. It may be that these charwomen ought to have larger compensation. But after all this seems to be about the compensation proper for the service. It commands the service and it is greatly sought after. I am quite willing, if the gentleman has information that would warrant it, that the amount should be increased.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. Does my colleague from Illinois think that $280 a year is enough for these women for the work which they do?

Mr. CANNON. Two hours a day?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I think it is very fair compensation, I will say to my friend.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not a fact that in the House Office Building—and I say so from experience—they work about four hours a day?

Mr. CANNON. I am not advised. It may be so during the sessions of Congress.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; I shall be glad to do so. I have not the floor. I was trying to get at the facts in this case.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. What is the average wage paid in the gentleman's vicinity at home for the servants who do household labor, where they do all kinds of family work, including cooking, washing, scrubbing the floors, and things of that kind?

Mr. FOWLER. I do not know.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman believe it exceeds $5 a week?

Mr. FOWLER. I am inclined to think that the average price would not exceed $5 per week.

Mr. COX. Is it not the gentleman's candid, sincere judgment that the average price does not exceed $4 a week in the homes where servant girls do cooking, washing, scrubbing, and everything else?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. My desire was briefly to call attention to the discrimination in the pay of charwomen. I moved to strike out $240 a year and insert $180, for the purpose of emphasizing the matter, intending when we come to the other item of $180 to move to increase the amount to $240.

Mr. BURLESON. But surely the gentleman from Kentucky did not understand me when I said to him that the service rendered is not the same.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I understood the gentleman.

Mr. BURLESON. In some cases the cleaners work two or three hours, or perhaps three and one-half hours, and in the other case they work probably only an hour or an hour and a half.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. We will probably not get to the item on page 13 to-day, and I hope that we may have some information on it by the time we get to it.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak in opposition to the pending amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. FOWLER. An amendment was offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], and I desire to speak in opposition to that amendment, only one speech having been made thereon.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] was to strike out $240 and insert $180.

Mr. FOWLER. I beg the pardon of the Chair. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] has just taken his seat after delivering himself upon a motion to strike out the last word, and I desire to speak in opposition to that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, in answer to my opposition to the low wage and the humble manner in which the service is done by these charwomen, my distinguished friend [Mr. Cox] interposes the average wage paid in my district to people doing such work as general housework, and he asks if $5 a week or $4 a week is not sufficient for that work.

Mr. COX. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. That was not my question.

Mr. FOWLER. Well, that was inferred by me—that that was the tenor of the gentleman's question.

Mr. COX. I was simply asking as to what the average wages were. I did not say that was enough.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not desire to misquote the gentleman. I desire to say that those who perform that kind of labor in my district are given homes in the houses where they work and are treated as members of the house, and no woman is required to get down on her knees and hands and crawl over the floor, filthy and dirty, for the purpose of mopping it up. He who thinks 75 cents a day is sufficient pay for such services places a very low estimate upon the unfortunate poor of this land. I never had a woman or a man get down on hands and knees for the purpose of scrubbing and cleaning my house, and as long as I live no person by my will shall ever be required to go through such humble and degrading course of work; and it is a shame that any white man should indorse such a course. I never intend to vote for a bill, whether it be in a municipality or in such a legislative body as this, which will entail upon poor, unfortunate mankind, with poverty staring them in the face, the necessity of humbling them by placing them on hands and knees to crawl for hours through the filth and dirt in order to clean a floor for me or for anybody else. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BLACKMON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 22871. An act to establish agricultural extension departments in connection with agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Assessor's office: Assessor, $3,500, and $500 additional as chairman of the excise and personal-tax boards; 2 assistant assessors, at $2,000 each; clerks—4, including 1 in arrears division, at $1,400 each, 4 at $1,200 each, 7, including 1 in charge of records, at $1,000 each, 2 at $900 each; draftsman, $1,200; assistant or clerk, $900; license clerk, $1,200; inspector of licenses, $1,200; assistant inspector of licenses, $1,000; messengers—1 $660, 1 $450; 3 assistant assessors, at $3,000 each; clerk to board of assistant assessors, $1,500; messenger and driver for board of assistant assessors, $600; 2 clerks, at $720 each; temporary clerk hire, $500; record clerk, $1,500; in all, $48,290.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to the provision, "Assessor, $3,500, and $500 additional as chairman of the excise and personal-tax boards." I do not think there is anything in the law to justify that appropriation of $500.

Mr. BURLESON. The excise board and the personal-tax board have been created by law. The additional compensation to the assessor to serve the two boards has been carried in the bill for many years. Two boards are provided for by law.

Mr. COX. I understand that, but there is no provision for the increase in the man's salary of $500 by reason of the fact that he served the excise board.

Mr. BURLESON. It is an item that has been carried in the bill as compensation for the man many years.

Mr. COX. That might be true, but because it is carried in current law does not justify this appropriation.

Mr. BURLESON. The additional duty is imposed upon him, and the compensation of $500 is fixed for the service which he renders to these two boards.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Texas, Has the $500 been carried in the bill from the time the $3,500 salary was carried in the bill?

Mr. BURLESON. I am unable to state whether the salary of the assessor has always been fixed at $3,500, but I know that since it has been fixed at $3,500 the $500 additional allowed him for the service on the two boards has been carried in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of any further evidence from the committee that the $500 additional is not original with the $3,500, the Chair will be inclined to sustain the point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that that item be passed over until it can be looked up.

Mr. COX. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that this item be passed over for the present. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Auditor's office: Auditor, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,250; bookkeeper, $1,800; accountant, $1,500; clerks—three at $1,600 each, three at $1,400 each, one at $1,350, four at $1,200 each, five at $1,000 each, one $936, two at $900 each, two at $720 each; messenger, $600; disbursing officer, $3,000; deputy disbursing officer, $1,600; clerks—one $1,200, two at $1,000 each, one $900; messenger, $480; in all, $43,656.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee what was the moving cause of creating an accountant at $1,500? That is in line 6.

Mr. BURLESON. I will read the gentleman the note of the commissioners on that particular point:

NOTE.—The work in the auditor's office has increased within the past few years so rapidly and in such volume as to call for additional expert help, particularly along accounting, analytical, and statistical lines. An accountant of ability and good technical training can not be obtained under $1,500. A position of this kind in the office would result in a saving of money to the District by enabling the auditor to inaugurate a series of cost accounts from which could be obtained information that would show whether the several branches of the District government are being economically and efficiently administered.

That was the reason that prompted us to make the appropriation.

Mr. FOWLER. Has the gentleman any information as to whether this additional work has come up within the last 12 months?

Mr. BURLESON. The note states that the work has rapidly increased in volume.

Mr. FOWLER. I was trying to get at the specific character of the work which had increased, if the gentleman has information concerning it.

Mr. BURLESON. The only information we have is that set forth in this note. It appealed to us as a sound reason why we should allow this.

Mr. FOWLER. Was the recommendation made by the commissioners?

Mr. BURLESON. It was, and properly estimated for, or it would not be in this bill.

Mr. FOWLER. I am quite sure of the careful scrutiny of the gentleman and his committee, and I might take the liberty of saying that his committee deserves a great deal of credit, but I do not wish to throw bouquets unnecessarily, because this is well known to this House.

Mr. BURLESON. We are feeling in need of bouquets at this particular juncture.

Mr. FOWLER. If the accountant is necessary I have no objection to creating the new office. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of corporation counsel: Corporation counsel, $5,000; first assistant, $2,500; second assistant, $1,800; third assistant, $1,600; fourth assistant, $1,500; fifth assistant, $1,500; stenographers, one $1,200, one $840; clerk, $720; in all, $16,660.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order to this paragraph.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph that it changes the law in relation to the salary of the corporation counsel. It is changed from $4,500 to $5,000 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BURLESON. To the entire paragraph?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; I will modify my point of order and make it only against the salary of the corporation counsel.

Mr. BURLESON. I do not care to discuss the matter. I will offer the following amendment: After the word "counsel" insert the figures "$4,500."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 14, after the word "counsel" insert "$4,500."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, the question raised in the hearings before the committee and brought to the floor of the House was that the salary of the corporation counsel should be increased because of the "unusual" service rendered by the corporation counsel. The services rendered by the present corporation counsel are quite "unusual" in the practice of law, I must grant. I have here a transcript of the record of the Supreme Court in the case of the District of Columbia, plaintiff in error, versus James T. Petty, Charles W. Church, et al. That discloses, Mr. Chairman, that in 1901 or 1902 a disbursing clerk in the employ of the United States Government misappropriated about $73,000. The corporation counsel, after the expiration of about a year, brought suit in the name of the District of Columbia against the then auditor of the District of Columbia, a man named Petty. That suit was brought upon Petty's official bond. The penal sum of that bond was $20,000. The District attorney, in rendering "unusual" service, brought suit, not against Petty for the $73,000, the amount of the defalcation, but he brought suit for $20,000, the penal sum in the bond, for which the sureties were bound. The usual service rendered by a corporation counsel would have been to bring suit against the principal for the full amount of the loss, $73,000, and against the sureties on the bond for the penal sum of the bond, which was $20,000, but under this proceeding, as I just said, a suit was brought even against the principal himself for only $20,000, thus not endeavoring to recover $53,000, if there was liability.

On the 9th of November, 1903, this corporation counsel filed suit of the description just set out. To that petition, or declaration, a demurrer was filed and sustained. Then the corporation counsel was directed by the court to file an amended petition or declaration and set out wherein the original declaration was faulty. The corporation counsel in this "unusual" service did file the amended declaration, but it took him nearly two years to do it, and when he filed it he failed to incorporate in his amended declaration the very words or the substance which the court had directed him to allege in his amended declaration when he overruled the original declaration. That went along for perhaps a couple of years more and a demurrer was sustained to the amended petition. The court again set out what this corporation counsel in this "unusual" proceeding should allege, but again he failed to allege it, and a demurrer again was sustained. Then, again, after the lapse of perhaps two years more, this corporation counsel filed another amended declaration. Again he failed to set out in his amended declaration the allegations the court had said to him he should set out. Another demurrer was filed and was sustained. This went along until three years one month and three days had elapsed between the filing of the original declaration and the filing of the last defective amended declaration. The court, in finally passing upon it, held that it was not a public fund and that the auditor was not liable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, as I say, the court, in disposing of it, held that the auditor was not liable in the first place; that this money which was misappropriated was not a public fund, but that it was money which the commissioners had caused people in the District of Columbia to deposit with them before they would authorize permit work to be done. The court, dismissing these numerous faulty, defective declarations, recites that almost eight years had intervened since the filing of the original declaration, and since that judgment there has never been anything done toward bringing a suit against the commissioners upon their official bonds to collect this $73,000 from them, which, as the court has substantially decided, they are answerable for.

And even as we stand here now the few remaining months of limitation are running, with this sum of money unpaid, with this deficit standing there to be made up by nobody.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. Was the present corporation counsel the corporation counsel at that time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman tell me who the present corporation counsel is?

Mr. BURLESON. A man by the name of Thomas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. These faulty declarations are all signed by one E. H. Thomas, as corporation counsel.

Mr. BURLESON. Was he the corporation counsel at the time the suit was instituted?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. He is the corporation counsel who filed the first defective declaration and who filed the subsequent defective declarations.

Mr. COX. What is the statute of limitation there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It was 12 years, and now something like 11 years have run.

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman anything at all as to what excuse the corporation counsel gave for this peculiar condition of affairs?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. An appropriation has been asked to increase his salary for unusual services. I take it for granted this proceeding is a fair illustration of the unusual services rendered. The court further says:

> His derelictions the act expressly charged not to the auditor but to the commissioners.

And yet this corporation counsel is still in the employment of the Government with the official bonds of the commissioners good and binding and no move is made to collect this $73,000.

Mr. BATES. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. BATES. Does the gentleman say that the court held that the commissioners were liable for this private fund?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The court says this in speaking of the auditor, "His derelictions the act expressly charged not to the auditor but to the commissioners." That is what the court says.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Gladly.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Who has the appointment of the corporation counsel?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The commissioners have the appointment of the corporation counsel, and I have introduced a bill taking it out of the hands of the commissioners to appoint the corporation counsel who has thus permitted them to be shielded when they should come into court and pay the defalcation for which they are responsible. My bill provides the President shall appoint the corporation counsel and some of these days I hope to have the good luck to get it before this House for passage.

Mr. COX. Somebody has to make this defalcation good.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Now, an effort is made to go further than that. The commissioners themselves sent to this body through the Secretary of the Treasury at the last session of Congress an item to go in the deficiency bill to pay this money.

Mr. COX. That is the very point I wanted to bring out, that somebody had to make it good.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But instead of having it made good out of the bond of the people who are the real defaulters they have recommended that the United States Government pay that shortage.

Mr. COX. That is the point exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I know nothing of the facts which resulted in this suit. The present commissioners I know were not the commissioners at the time the unauthorized regulation was made which resulted in the loss of this particular lawsuit. The only representations which have been made to us with reference to the corporation counsel were that he is a man of high character, a man of ability, and that he has discharged efficiently every duty imposed upon him by the laws of the municipal government. The commissioners have repeatedly urged that his salary be increased to $5,000. That is less than is being paid a number of employees of the Government who are lawyers and who have less important and less onerous duties imposed upon them than are imposed upon this official.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Farmers' produce market: Market master, $900; assistant market master, who shall also act as night watchman, $600; watchman, $600; laborer for sweeping B Street sidewalk, used for market purposes, and the farmers' produce market square, $360; sweeping B Street, used for market purposes, $480; hauling refuse (street sweepings), $600; in all, $3,540.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment at the end of line 9, page 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> At the end of line 9, on page 7, insert the following:
> "For the erection of shelters on the open space at the intersection of Ohio and Louisiana Avenues with Tenth and Twelfth Streets, bounded by Tenth and Twelfth and B and Little B Streets NW., known and designated as the farmers' produce market, and the necessary paving in connection therewith, $47,000; and the limitation of 10 cents per day for each space at the above-mentioned market contained in the act of June 27, 1906, is hereby revoked, and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to charge hereafter not to exceed 20 cents per day for each."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I make the point of order against the amendment that it is new legislation.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will desist until I make a statement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I reserve the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment just read is a portion of the bill itself as proposed by the commissioners of this city. The amount stated in the amendment is the amount fixed in the Book of Estimates by them. The design of the provision itself is to afford those farmers who can do business directly with the consumers of Washington market facilities for that purpose. In the present situation Washington City seems to have a market under corporate control, a market that the farmers of the surrounding country, the first and most direct supply area for the consumers of Washington, can not enjoy. And the District Commissioners themselves, after the fullest consideration of the rights of the consumers of this city and the farmers dealing directly with them, have proposed this provision now for the third time. I only ask that the House listen to what the commissioners themselves have said in lieu of a statement about the matter myself. They say:

> NOTE.—During the fiscal year 1912, $5,463.40 was collected for the use of space at this market. The lighting arrangement was improved for the benefit of the farmers during the very early morning hours, specially during the winter months. This installation was made at an expense of $349.75. The gross receipts for the past nine years amounted to $41,203.35; expenses, $27,615.15 (estimated); net revenue for nine years, $13,588.20.
> In the busy season as many as 545 wagons have been accommodated on one day. Average number daily, about 250.

These shelters have been urged by the farmers for a number of years past and committees appointed to represent them in this matter have stated that the farmers are willing to pay more for the use of space if such shelter from the weather is afforded them, and the commissioners have twice included an item for the erection of the shelters in their estimates to Congress.

This market provides the consumer with produce direct from the farmers at prices very much to the advantage of the former. As a check on excess prices of other dealers every effort should be made to encourage trade at this market in the way of shelter and conveniences for doing business. Other large cities are expending large sums for the establishment of markets for the producer, fully realizing the advantages that will accrue to the community at large, and Washington, the National Capital, should not remain behind other progressive cities in this respect.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the subject of the consumer's rights and of the farmer's rights as a producer is one worthy of the consideration of this House, and this amendment ought to receive consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS] has expired. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] makes a point of order, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking to extend my remarks in the RECORD in order to insert the transcript of record of "The District of Columbia, plaintiff in error, v. James T. Petty; Charles W. Church, et al., executors of Charles B. Church, deceased; Jesse B. Wilson, and George T. Dearing."

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to know how many pages there are and about how much it will cost.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman knows more about that than I do. There are 41 pages.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] will not object. A statement has been made in regard to this corporation attorney's record, and we ought to have this transcript in the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I desire to have it in full in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The transcript referred to is as follows:

IN THE COURT OF APPEALS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

(No. 2215.)

District of Columbia, etc., appellant, v. James T. Petty et al. Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. At law. No. 46544. District of Columbia, plaintiff, v. James T. Petty, Charles W. Church, William A. H. Church, Mary A. Church, and Joseph J. Darlington, executors of Charles B. Church; Jesse B. Wilson, and George T. Dearing, defendants.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
District of Columbia, ss:

Be it remembered, that in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, at the city of Washington, in said District, at the times hereinafter mentioned, the following papers were filed and proceedings had in the above-entitled cause, to wit:

DECLARATION, ETC., FILED NOVEMBER 9, 1903.

In the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. At law. No. 46544. District of Columbia, plaintiff, v. James T. Petty, Charles B. Church, Jesse B. Wilson, George T. Dearing, defendants.

The plaintiff, the District of Columbia, a municipal corporation, sues the defendants, James T. Petty, Charles B. Church, Jesse B. Wilson, and George T. Dearing, for that, to wit, on the 1st day of May, A. D. 1888, the defendant, James T. Petty, was the auditor of the District of Columbia, to which office the said defendant, James T. Petty, before, on, from, and after the said date, to wit, the 1st day of May, A. D. 1888, had been appointed and continually held, and was the incumbent thereof until, to wit, the 15th day of August, A. D. 1903. And for that the defendant James T. Petty, by the name "Jas. T. Petty"; the defendant Charles B. Church, by the name "Chas. B. Church"; the defendant James B. Wilson; and the defendant George T. Dearing, by the name "Geo. T. Dearing," on the 1st day of May, A. D. 1888, by their certain joint and several writing obligatory, sealed with their seals, a copy whereof is now shown to the court here, the date whereof is the day and year last aforesaid, acknowledged themselves to be held and firmly bound unto the plaintiff, the District of Columbia, in the sum of $20,000, to be paid to the said District of Columbia when they, the said defendants, should be thereunto afterwards requested, which said writing obligatory was and is subject to a certain condition thereunder written whereby, after reciting to the effect following, to wit:

"Whereas the above bounden, James T. Petty, has been appointed to the office of auditor in and for the District of Columbia," it is therein set forth as follows:

"Now, therefore, the condition of said obligation is such that if said James T. Petty shall faithfully and efficiently perform all the duties of his said office as provided for by law, and the rules and regulations from time to time duly prescribed for the government of the civil service of said District, and shall well and truly pay over, disburse, and account for all moneys that shall come to his hands, as the law and orders governing said service shall require, then said obligation to be void, otherwise to remain in full force."

Yet the said defendant, James T. Petty, contrary to the form and effect of the said writing obligatory and of the conditions thereof, failed and neglected to faithfully and efficiently perform all the duties of his said office as provided by law, and failed and neglected to faithfully and efficiently observe the said rules and regulations, and failed and neglected to truly pay over, disburse, and account for all moneys that came to his hands, as the law and orders governing his duties and services required, in this:

First. That said defendant Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, failed to account for moneys of the District of Columbia, represented by checks of the amounts, dates, and numbers given below, which were drawn by the disbursing officer, Charles C. Rogers, of the District of Columbia, or his deputy, and countersigned by the said Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, or by the acting auditor to the order of the said auditor of the District of Columbia, on the Treasurer of the United States, charged to the "Permit fund, District of Columbia," which said checks should have been deposited by the said defendant, James T. Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, in accordance with law and the rules governing the conduct of his office, with the Treasurer of the United States, to the credit of the appropriation "Improvements and repairs, District of Columbia, assessment and permit work"; but said checks were not so deposited, but were indorsed by the said Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, and afterwards cashed at the Central National Bank, of Washington, D. C., and the proceeds of the said checks so cashed were never in any manner paid or accounted for to the said plaintiff or deposited in any bank or in the Treasury of the United States to its credit.

Second. The said defendant Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, failed to account for moneys of the District of Columbia represented by checks of the amounts, dates, and numbers given below, which were drawn by the disbursing officer of the District of Columbia, Charles C. Rogers, or his deputy, and countersigned by the said Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, or by the acting auditor, on the Treasurer of the United States, to the order of the said James T. Petty, auditor as aforesaid, and charged to various appropriations of the District of Columbia, which checks were indorsed by the said James T. Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, and should, in accordance with law and the rules and regulations aforesaid, have been deposited in the Traders' National Bank, of Washington, D. C., as reimbursements of the deposit and assessment fund; but the said checks were not so deposited, but after being indorsed by the auditor as aforesaid were cashed at the Central National Bank, of Washington, D. C., and the proceeds of the said checks so cashed were never in any manner paid or accounted for to the said plaintiff.

Fifth. That the defendant Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, failed to account for moneys of the District of Columbia represented by checks of the amounts, dates, and numbers given below, drawn by the said James T. Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, upon the Central National Bank, of Washington, D. C., payable to the order of the said James T. Petty, as disbursing agent Rock Creek Park, District of Columbia; that the said checks or the proceeds thereof were used by the said Petty in his capacity as such disbursing agent, and the said checks so drawn by him as auditor were drawn without authority of law, and the proceeds thereof were never in any manner repaid or accounted for to the said plaintiff.

contrary to the form and effect of the said writing obligatory and of the said condition thereof; whereby an action has accrued to the plaintiff to demand and have of and from the defendants the said sum of $20,000, yet the defendants, although often requested so to do, have not as yet paid the said sum of $20,000, but they to do this have heretofore wholly refused and still do refuse, to the damage of the plaintiff of $20,000, and thereupon it brings this suit and claims said sum with interest and costs.

(Copy of bond.)

Know all men by these presents:

That we, James T. Petty, Charles B. Church, Jesse B. Wilson, and George T. Dearing, of the District of Columbia, are held and firmly bound unto the District of Columbia in the sum of $20,000, lawful money of the United States of America, to be paid to the said District of Columbia, or to the certain attorney, successor, or assigns thereof, for which payment, well and truly to be made, we and each of us do bind ourselves, and each of our heirs, executors, and administrators, jointly and severally, firmly by these presents.

Sealed with our seals. Dated this 1st day of May, A. D. 1888.

Whereas the above bounden James T. Petty has been appointed to the office of auditor in and for the District of Columbia: Now, therefore, the condition of said obligation is such that if the said James T. Petty shall faithfully and efficiently perform all the duties of his said office, as provided for by law and the rules and regulations from time to time duly prescribed for the government of the civil service of said District, and shall well and truly pay over, disburse, and account for all moneys that shall come to his hands, as the law and orders governing said service shall require, then said obligation to be void; otherwise to remain in full force.

DEMURRER, FILED JANUARY 22, 1904.

* * * * * * *

The defendants Charles B. Church, Jesse B. Wilson, and George T. Dearing say that the declaration in the above-entitled cause is bad in substance.

J. J. DARLINGTON,
RALSTON & SIDDONS,
Attorneys.

Among the points of law intended to be argued in support of the above demurrer is that there is no law nor any rule or regulation pleaded under which defendant Petty was chargeable with the custody of, or otherwise accountable for, any of the moneys in the said declaration mentioned.

SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1906.

Session resumed pursuant to adjournment, Mr. Justice Wright presiding.

Upon motion of the plaintiff, the time within which to amend the declaration in this cause is further extended for the period of 15 days from this date.

AMENDED DECLARATION, FILED MAY 1 TO DECEMBER 12, 1906.

* * * * * * *

Now comes the plaintiff, the District of Columbia, by leave of court first had and obtained, amends its declaration filed in this cause by adding thereto the following count, viz:

The plaintiff, the District of Columbia, a municipal corporation, sues the defendants James T. Petty, Charles B. Church, Jesse B. Wilson, and George T. Dearing, for that the mayor of the city of Washington, by and with the consent of the board of aldermen thereof, were authorized to appoint an auditor and a comptroller for said city by act of Congress approved July 7, 1870 (16 Stats., 191, sec. 5); and the said act provided that it shall be the duty of the auditor to audit all accounts against the said corporation, to certify the same, when found correct, to the comptroller and to retain the originals of all contracts made and orders given for all descriptions of work or improvements by the corporation aforesaid; that it shall be the duty of the comptroller to keep an exact account of all warrants issued in the manner hereinafter provided for, and of all taxes levied by the corporation, under their respective heads; to countersign and keep an accurate record of all receipts for taxes or other revenue of any description whatever, given by the collector and register, such receipts not to be valid unless so countersigned, and compare the same daily with the books of said collector and register; that each and every account against the corporation of Washington, when audited and certified by the auditor, shall be paid by a warrant of the comptroller, countersigned by the mayor; and in no case shall payments be made in any other manner than provided for in this act. But no account shall be paid, by warrant or otherwise, unless there is a fund to the credit of that particular account. The money received from any and all sources, for and on account of the corporation, shall, on the day of receipt, be deposited by the collector and register to the credit of the city of Washington, in such place as may be designated as a depository for the funds of the corporation by an act of the board of aldermen and board of common council, approved by the mayor; and such depository shall, each day that deposits are made, furnish a statement of the same to the comptroller, to be by him filed in his office.

That by act of Congress approved February 21, 1871 (16 Stats., 419), the District of Columbia was created a body corporate for municipal purposes, with power to contract and to be contracted with, sued and be sued, plead and be impleaded, and with certain other powers and a certain form of government, as will by reference to the said act of Congress appear; that the legislative assembly created by the said act was given power to provide by law for the election or appointment of such ministerial officers as may be deemed necessary to carry into effect the laws of said District, to prescribe their duties, their terms of office, and the rate and manner of their compensation; and that the charter of the said city of Washington was by the said act repealed and all officers of the said corporation abolished on and after the 1st day of June, 1871. That the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia continued the office of auditor and the office of comptroller from the said 1st day of June, 1871, for a period of 45 days by act passed June 2, 1871; that by act of the legislative assembly approved August 23, 1871, the duties of certain officers for said District of Columbia were prescribed and it was thereby provided:

"SEC. 10. That it shall be the duty of the auditor of the District of Columbia to audit all accounts against the said District, and also to compare all accounts against the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the county of Washington created prior to the 1st day of June, 1871, and if found correct upon comparisons with the appropriations made therefor by the legislative assembly and the report of the special commission to audit said claims, a copy of which shall be filed with the auditor by said commission, to approve and certify the same. He shall keep a record of all bills certified by him, their amounts, the appropriation to which they are chargeable, and the date of approval. He shall retain in his office the originals of all contracts and agreements not otherwise provided for. He shall also examine and audit all accounts, not otherwise provided for in this act, and certify the amount of the same to the comptroller. He shall countersign all warrants drawn by the comptroller if, upon comparison with the amount certified by him, he shall find the same correct, and shall give bond, to be approved by the governor, in the sum of $20,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office. He shall receive an annual compensation of $3,000. The deputy auditor shall perform such duties as the auditor may prescribe, and, in case of temporary disability of said auditor, from sickness or other cause, he shall act in the capacity of auditor during the continuance of such temporary disability, and no longer, and shall receive an annual compensation of $2,000, and shall give bond, to be approved by the governor, in the sum of $15,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office.

"SEC. 11. That it shall be the duty of the comptroller of the District of Columbia to keep an exact and accurate account of all appropriations made by the legislative assembly, and all bonds, stocks, and certificates of indebtedness issued by said District. He shall receive and file in his office a transcript of all assessments of taxes upon real estate and personal property in the District of Columbia so soon as the list shall have been made by the superintendent of assessments and taxes. He shall each year prepare from such transcript an aggregate of the amount of taxes levied, and shall compare the same with the assessment lists and the tax books of the collector of taxes. He shall charge to the respective appropriations all payments made upon the certificate of the auditor, and submit to the governor a monthly statement of the balance outstanding to the credit of the respective appropriations. He shall examine all accounts certified to him by the auditor, and if satisfied that they are correct, draw warrants upon the treasurer therefor, and in no case whatever shall any warrant be drawn upon any appropriations unless there is a balance to the credit thereof. He shall carefully file all receipts, and record in a book prepared to that purpose, all reports of tax sales (including those to the District of Columbia) made to him by the collector. He shall each week compare the record of the register with the treasurer's record of license certificates issued, and shall keep an account of any and all transactions which, by law, may be required to pass through his office. He shall receive a salary of $4,000 per annum, and give bond, to be approved by the governor, in the sum of $50,000, conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties."

That by act of Congress approved June 20, 1874 (18 Stat., p. 116) all provisions of law providing for an executive, for a secretary for the District, for a legislative assembly, for a board of public works, and for a Delegate in Congress in the District of Columbia were repealed, and the President of the United States was authorized to appoint a commission, consisting of three persons, who should, until otherwise provided by law, exercise all the power and authority then lawfully vested in the governor or board of public works of said District, subject to certain limitations; that said commissioners were authorized to abolish any office, consolidate two or more offices, reduce the number of employees, remove from office, and make appointment to any office authorized by law. That under said power the said commissioners on the 11th day of August, 1876, consolidated the three offices of auditor, comptroller, and deputy comptroller into that of auditor, and by a subsequent order, dated August 19, 1876, the said order of the 11th day of August, 1876, was by the said commissioners modified and the said auditor was directed to perform the duties of auditor and comptroller; that by act of Congress, approved June 11, 1878 (20 Stat., p. 102), Congress created a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia and provided that the District of Columbia should remain a municipal corporation; that all laws then in force relating to the District of Columbia not inconsistent with the provisions of said act should remain in full force and effect, and the appointment of three commissioners was authorized to exercise all the powers and authority vested in the then commissioners of the said District, and by section 4 of said act it is provided, among other things, that all taxes collected shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and the same, as well as the appropriations to be made by Congress, shall be disbursed for the expenses of the District on itemized voucher, which shall have been audited and approved by the auditor of the District of Columbia, certified by the commissioners or a majority of them.

That by act of Congress approved March 3, 1881 (21 Stat., p. 466), it was provided that the accounts of all disbursements of the commissioners of said District shall be made monthly to the accounting officers of the Treasury by the auditor of the District of Columbia on vouchers certified by the commissioners, as now required by law; that the same provision as last above cited is also contained in section 3 of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1882 (22 Stat., p. 144); that by order duly passed the Commissioners of the District of Columbia on the 8th day of December, 1882, abolished the office of comptroller and imposed the duties of said office on the said auditor, and directed said auditor to give bond in the penalty required by law; that, to wit, on the 13th day of June, 1888, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia passed an order of the tenor and effect as shown by Exhibit A, attached hereto as part hereof.

That by act of Congress approved March 3, 1891 (26 Stat., p. 1064), the said pay clerk mentioned in paragraph 4 of the said order, dated, to wit, the 13th day of June, 1888, was recognized and described in the said act as disbursement clerk, who was thereby authorized to pay laborers and employees of the District of Columbia with moneys advanced to him by the commissioners in their discretion upon pay rolls or other vouchers audited and approved by the auditor of the District of Columbia and certified by the commissioners, as then required by law, which said pay rolls and other vouchers the said act required to be included in the account of the commissioners.

That in the course of administration the commissioners found it expedient that all work done by the District of Columbia as the result of cuts made in streets, avenues, roads, and alleys in said District be paid from a fund known as the "Deposit and assessment fund," which was whole cost work, and thereupon the said commissioners on, to wit, the 6th day of February, 1897, passed an order providing in tenor and effect that for convenience in keeping the accounts in case of repairs made by the District of cuts in pavements and other work done by the District which were paid for from private deposits, a general account be opened, styled "Deposit and assessment fund," and that all material and labor for such works to be charged against said account and to be paid by assessments against the deposits made for such purposes.

That from, to wit, July 1, 1878, until, to wit, the 30th day of June, 1898, except as to the duties imposed on the disbursing clerk, hereinbefore mentioned, the auditor of the District of Columbia was and continued to be the officer in charge of the disbursements of money which came into the hands of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. That the duties of the said auditor under the said two orders dated, to wit, the 13th day of June, 1888, and February 6, 1897, required that said auditor should keep accounts with individual depositors of moneys which they had deposited with the collector of taxes to reimburse the District of Columbia for the expenses which as whole cost work done on public streets, avenues, alleys, roads, and spaces by the District at the solicitation of individual citizens and for their benefit; that when said whole cost work was done for which said deposit was made the said auditor was required to make requisition, approved by the commissioners, for the amount thereof upon the collector of taxes, and to receive the said money so drawn on the said requisition and deposit the same in some bank or banks to his credit as auditor of the District of Columbia, to be held to reimburse the appropriations out of which moneys had been expended to do said work or to pay direct from the said moneys in his hands as aforesaid the actual cost of labor and material for whole cost work performed as aforesaid, and to return to individual depositors the amount of money to their credit and unexpended.

That prior to the said order of February 6, 1897, by act of Congress approved August 7, 1894 (28 Stats., pp. 247, 248), it was provided, among other things, that property owners who requested improvements under the permit system shall deposit in advance with the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia an amount equal to one-half of the estimated cost of such improvements; that all money received by the collector of taxes for the District of Columbia for work done upon the request of property owners shall be deposited by him in the United States Treasury to the credit of the permit fund; that upon completion of work done at the request of property owners, the commissioners shall repay to the then current appropriation for assessment and permit work out of the permit fund, a sum equivalent to one-half of the cost of the work, and shall return to the depositors from the same fund, as application may be made therefor, any surplus that may remain over and above one-half of the cost of the work; that the said repayment to the appropriation for assessment and permit work and the said return to the depositors from the said permit fund above mentioned were duties which were required of the said auditor. That the said work was actually known as "half-cost work."

That the collector of taxes, upon receiving the moneys on account of the said whole-cost work deposited the same in bank to his credit as collector of taxes, which said money was drawn from time to time therefrom upon request made by the said auditor, and the said commissioners directed the said collector of taxes to pay the amount thereof to the said auditor, and thereupon the said collector of taxes paid over the same to the said auditor, taking his receipt therefor. That the said requests of the said auditor and the said orders of the said commissioners are too great in number to be set forth in this declaration; that moneys for the said half-cost work on deposit being received by the collector of taxes were by him deposited as required by law in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the permit fund; that upon requisitions by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia upon the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States that official advanced to the said commissioners certain funds from time to time out of the said permit fund.

That by act of Congress approved June 30, 1898 (30 Stats., 526), a disbursing officer was created for the District of Columbia who was required to give bond to the United States for the faithful performance of the duties of his office in the disbursing and accounting, according to law, for all moneys of the United States and the District of Columbia that should come into his hands. That the said disbursing officer never received any of the moneys derived from the said whole-cost work, and the said money continued to be received and disbursed as aforesaid; that as to the said half-cost work from the time of the appointment of the said disbursing officer the same was received by the collector of taxes and paid by him into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the permit fund and drawn therefrom on the request of the commissioners on the said Secretary of the Treasury and placed to the credit of the said disbursing officer with the Treasurer of the United States; that the duties of the said auditor continued as to the said half-cost work under the said orders of the commissioners and the said statutes as aforesaid.

That it became and was the duty of the said auditor to see upon the completion of the said half-cost work that the then current appropriation for assessment and permit work was repaid to the extent of one-half of the cost of said work out of the said permit fund; that to accomplish this the said auditor, with the approval of the commissioners, stated an account in his favor as auditor of the District of Columbia, and thereupon the said disbursing officer issued his check on the moneys advanced to him by the said Secretary of the Treasury out of the said permit fund in favor of the said auditor, who countersigned the same, and it then and there became the duty of the said auditor from time to time, upon receipt of each check, to properly account for and disburse the said money and cause the said appropriation for assessment and permit work to be reimbursed out of the said funds so received as aforesaid by him.

That by act of Congress approved July 1, 1902 (32 Stats., p. 592), it was provided that the auditor of the District of Columbia shall continue to prepare and countersign all checks issued by the disbursing officer, and no checks involving disbursements of public moneys by the disbursing officer shall be valid unless countersigned by the auditor of the District of Columbia; that, to wit, on the 1st day of May, A. D. 1888, the defendant, James T. Petty, was the auditor of the District of Columbia, to which office the said defendant, James T. Petty, on, from, and after the said date, to wit, the 1st day of May, A. D. 1888, had been appointed and continually held and was the incumbent thereof until, to wit, the 16th day of August, A. D. 1903. And for that the defendant, James T. Petty, by the name of "Jas. T. Petty," the defendant Charles B. Church, by the name of "Chas. B. Church," the defendant Jesse B. Wilson, and the defendant George T. Deering, by the name of "Geo. T. Deering," on the 1st day of May, A. D. 1888, by their certain joint and several writing obligatory, sealed with their seals, a copy whereof is now shown to the court here, the date whereof is the day and year last aforesaid, acknowledged themselves to be held and firmly bound unto the plaintiff, the District of Columbia, in the sum of $20,000 to be paid to the said District of Columbia when they, the said defendants, should be thereunto afterwards requested, which said writing obligatory was and is subject to a certain condition thereunder written whereby after reciting to the effect following, to wit:

"Whereas the above bounden James T. Petty has been appointed to the office of auditor in and for the District of Columbia," it is therein set forth as follows:

"Now, therefore, the condition of said obligation is such that if said James T. Petty shall faithfully and efficiently perform all the duties of his said office, as provided by law, and the rules and regulations from time to time duly prescribed for the government of the civil service of said District; and shall well and truly pay over, disburse, and account for all moneys that shall come into his hands, as the law and orders governing said service shall require, then said obligation to be void, otherwise to remain in full force."

Yet the said defendant, James T. Petty, contrary to the form and effect of the said writing obligatory and of the conditions thereof, failed and neglected to faithfully and efficiently perform all the duties of his said office as provided by law, and failed and neglected to faithfully and efficiently observe the said rules and regulations, and failed and neglected to truly pay over, disburse, and account for all moneys that came to his hands as the law and orders governing his duties and services required, in this:

First. That said defendant Petty as auditor as aforesaid failed to account for moneys of the District of Columbia, represented by checks of the amounts, dates, and numbers given below, which were drawn by the disbursing officer, Charles C. Rogers, of the District of Columbia, or his deputy, and countersigned by the said Petty as auditor as aforesaid, or by the acting auditor, to the order of the said auditor of the District of Columbia, on the Treasurer of the United States, charged to the "Permit fund, District of Columbia," being half-cost work under the said act of Congress approved August 7, 1894, which said checks should have been deposited by the said defendant, James T. Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, in accordance with law and rules governing the conduct of his office, with the Treasurer of the United States to the credit of the appropriation "Improvements and repairs," District of Columbia, assessment and permit work; but said checks were not so deposited, but were indorsed by the said Petty as auditor as aforesaid and afterwards cashed at the Central National Bank of Washington, D. C., and the proceeds of the said checks were never in any manner paid or accounted for to the said plaintiff or deposited in any bank, or in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of any appropriation for assessment and permit work, as required by law and as hereinbefore set forth in this declaration.

Second. That the said defendant Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, failed to account for moneys of the District of Columbia represented by checks of the amounts, dates, and numbers given below, which were drawn by the disbursing officer of the District of Columbia, Charles C. Rogers, or his deputy, and countersigned by said Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, or by the acting auditor, on the Treasurer of the United States to the order of the said James T. Petty, auditor, as aforesaid, and charged to various appropriations of the District of Columbia, which checks were indorsed by the said James T. Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, and should, in accordance with law and the rules and regulations as aforesaid, have been deposited in the Traders' National Bank, Washington, D. C., as reimbursements of the deposit and assessment fund, whole-cost work, as said work is hereinbefore set forth; but the said checks were not so deposited, but, after being indorsed by the said auditor as aforesaid, were cashed at the Central National Bank of Washington, D. C., and the proceeds of said checks so cashed were never in any manner paid or accounted for to the plaintiff, and the said deposit and assessment fund was not reimbursed by the said Petty, as he was required to do, as hereinbefore set forth:

Third. That said defendant Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, failed to account for moneys of the District of Columbia represented by checks of the amounts, dates, and numbers given below, drawn by the said James T. Petty, auditor as aforesaid, to the order of the said James T. Petty as auditor as aforesaid, upon the Central National Bank of Washington, D. C., charged to the account of the said auditor in said bank; the said checks were intended for deposit in the Traders' National Bank of Washington, D. C., to reimburse the deposit and assesment fund where said fund was kept for whole-cost work, as said work is hereinbefore set forth; the said checks having been indorsed by the said James T. Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, were not so deposited, but the same were cashed at the Central National Bank of Washington, D. C., and the proceeds thereof were never in any manner paid or accounted for to the said plaintiff, and the said deposit and assessment fund was not reimbursed by the said Petty as he was required to do as hereinbefore set forth.

	Total	18,230.98

Fourth. That the said defendant Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, failed to account for moneys of the District of Columbia represented by checks of the amounts, dates, and numbers given below, drawn from funds belonging to said whole-cost work as said work is hereinbefore set forth, by the said James T. Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, the first two upon the Central National Bank of Washington, D. C., and the last three upon the National Capital Bank of Washington, D. C., all of said checks being payable to the order of the said James T. Petty as auditor aforesaid; that the said checks drawn to him as auditor, as aforesaid, should have been deposited at the said banks to the credit of the said Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, for the benefit of said whole-cost works, but the said checks were not so deposited, but having been indorsed by the said Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, were cashed at the Central National Bank of Washington, D. C., and the proceeds thereof were never in any manner paid or accounted for to the said plaintiff, and the said whole-cost work was not reimbursed by said Petty, as he was required to do, as hereinbefore set forth.

Fifth. That the said defendant Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, failed to account for moneys of the District of Columbia represented by checks of the amounts, dates, and numbers given below from funds belonging to said whole-cost work, as said work is hereinbefore set forth, were unlawfully drawn by the said James T. Petty, as auditor as aforesaid, upon the Central National Bank of Washington, D. C., payable to the order of the said James T. Petty, as disbursing agent, Rock Creek Park, D. C.; that the said checks, or the proceeds thereof, were unlawfully used by the said Petty in his capacity as such disbursing agent, and the said checks so drawn by him as auditor were drawn without authority of law from said funds of the District of Columbia, and the proceeds thereof were never in any manner repayed or accounted for to the said plaintiff, and the said whole-cost work was not reimbursed by the said Petty, as he was required to do, as hereinbefore set forth.

4613.	April 19, 1902	721.39	Cashed.

Contrary to the form and effect of the said writing obligatory, and of the said condition thereof whereby an action has accrued to the plaintiff to demand and have of and from the defendant the said sum of $20,000, yet the defendant, although often requested so to do, has not as yet paid the said sum of $20,000, but they to do this have heretofore wholly refused, and still do refuse, to the damage of the plaintiff of the sum of $20,000, and thereupon it brings this suit and claims said sum, with interest and costs.

REFER IN REPLY TO NO. 3-8.

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS
OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, June 13, 1888.

Ordered:

The collector of taxes of the District of Columbia, upon receiving a deposit for permit work, or for plumbers' or engineers' license fund, shall issue receipts therefor in duplicate, consecutively numbered, showing from whom, for what purpose, and the amount received; deliver the original receipt to the depositor, and transmit the duplicate to the auditor of the District of Columbia. He shall not pay out the moneys thus received except upon requisition of the auditor, approved by the commissioners.

2. The superintendent of streets and the superintendent of sewers, respectively, shall prepare in duplicate the pay rolls or other vouchers for services rendered or material furnished payable from the permit fund, which, after approval by the commissioners, as in cases of disbursements under an appropriation, shall be forwarded to the auditor for audit and payment.

3. The auditor of the District, after receiving a pay roll or other voucher, prepared in accordance with section 2 of this order, shall examine, approve the same if found to be correct, and make requisition upon the collector of taxes for the amount thereof, as provided in section 1 of this order.

4. Once a month, upon a day regularly set apart for the purpose, the pay clerk of the auditor's office shall take the rolls thus prepared, with the money necessary to meet the same, repair to the places where the work is being done, and, after proper identification, and receipt given, pay in cash to each claimant the amount found to be due. He shall give bond, with approved security in the sum of $5,000 for the faithful performance of the duties required of him.

5. The auditor of the District shall open an account with the collector of taxes, District of Columbia, debiting the balances turned over by the late collector, May 4, 1888, on account of permit and license funds, and all subsequent deposits, and crediting the requisitions honored by the collector in accordance with section 1 of this order.

6. The auditor of the District of Columbia shall debit himself with the moneys received from the collector of taxes upon requisition made as provided in section 1 and credit himself with payments upon vouchers duly certified and approved as in sections 2 and 7 of this order.

7. After the work for which a deposit has been made has been completed and paid for, the auditor shall state the account with the depositor, make requisition as in section 1 for any balance that may appear in his favor, and repay the same upon presentation of the original certificate of deposit.

The receipt of the depositor upon the original certificate, for the amount thus repaid, shall be the auditor's voucher for such repayment.

Official copy furnished the auditor, District of Columbia.

DEMURRER OF CHURCH AND DEARING TO AMENDED DECLARATION, FILED MARCH 9, 1907.

* * * * * * *

The defendants Charles B. Church and George T. Dearing say that the declaration in the above-entitled cause is bad in substance.

J. J. DARLINGTON,
Attorney for Defendants Church and Dearing.

NOTE.—Among the points of law intended to be argued in support of the above demurrer is that there is no law, nor is any rule or regulation duly prescribed for the government of the civil service in the District of Columbia pleaded, under which the defendant Petty was chargeable with the custody of, or otherwise accountable for, any of the moneys in the said declaration mentioned.

DEMURRER OF WILSON TO AMENDED DECLARATION, FILED MARCH 18, 1907.

* * * * * * *

The defendant, Jesse B. Wilson, says that the amended declaration in the above-entitled cause is bad in substance.

RALSTON & SIDDONS,
Defendant Wilson's Attorneys.

* * * * * * *

POINTS OF LAW TO BE ARGUED IN SUPPORT OF DEMURRER.

Among the points of law intended to be argued in support of the foregoing demurrer is—

That there is no law, rule, or regulation pleaded under which the defendant Petty was chargeable with the custody or otherwise accountable for any of the moneys in the said declaration mentioned; and

That prior to the alleged failure to account for moneys coming to his hands he had been relieved by law from all responsibility for the handling of money and his sureties consequently relieved from any default in connection therewith.

RALSTON & SIDDONS,
Attorneys for Defendant Wilson.

DEMURRER OF PETTY TO AMENDED DECLARATION, FILED MARCH 27, 1907.

* * * * * * *

The defendant James T. Petty says that the amended declaration in the above-entitled cause is bad in substance.

W. C. SULLIVAN, Attorney.

* * * * * * *

Among the points of law intended to be argued in support of the foregoing demurrer is that there is no law, nor any rule or regulation pleaded, under which the said defendant James T. Petty was chargeable with the custody of, or otherwise accountable for, any of the moneys in the said declaration mentioned.

SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1907.

Session resumed pursuant to adjournment, Mr. Justice Wright presiding.

Upon hearing the defendants' demurrers to the plaintiff's amended declaration, it is considered that said demurrers be, and the same are hereby, sustained.

OPINION, FILED OCTOBER 18, 1907.

* * * * * * *

The clause in the bond "as the law and orders governing said service shall require" does not refer to the manner in which moneys may have come into the hands of the auditor, but rather to the manner and method of accounting for it; that is, the purpose of the bond is primarily to hold the auditor for all public moneys received by him and, secondarily, to require him to account according to whatever, if any, system of accounting happened to be provided for by "the law and orders governing said service" (of accounting); it is not the intent of the bond to exempt the auditor from liability for moneys received according to the custom and routine of his office, although not according to the detail of some written law or order.

But it is necessary to the statement of a cause of action that the declaration set forth that the months for which it is claimed he failed to account "came into his hands." Ther is nothing in the first, second, third, and fourth paragraphs of the declaration which shows that the moneys were ever either actually or constructively in the possession of the defendant.

The following appears in the fifth paragraph:

"That the said checks or the proceeds thereof were unlawfully used by the said Petty * * *."

This adoption of the disjunctive is empty. It charges neither that he used the checks nor that be used the proceeds. Moreover, the phrase "were unlawfully used by the said Petty in his capacity as such disbursing agent" is no more than a conclusion of law, not an averment of fact. If he did make use of checks or proceeds, the manner of the use should be set out. The opinion of the court may then be taken as to whether such use was unlawful, but as it stands the entire sentence first quoted contains no averment of fact and is therefore to be disregarded on demurrer.

There appearing in none of the paragraphs and direct averment that the defendant Petty ever had the moneys in his possession and no averment of facts from which that conclusion follows, the demurrer must be sustained.

SUGGESTION OF DEATH OF CHARLES B. CHURCH, ETC., FILED JANUARY 5, 1909.

* * * * * * *

Now comes the plaintiff, District of Columbia, by its attorney, E. H. Thomas, and suggests the death of the defendant, Charles B. Church, on April 26, 1908, leaving a last will and testament which has been duly probated and admitted to record in proceedings 15281 of this court holding probate term, whereby Charles W. Church, William A. H. Church, Mary A. Church, and Joseph J. Darlington are appointed executors, all of whom have qualified.

And said plaintiff further moves the court that an order be passed making the said Charles W. Church, William A. H. Church, Mary A. Church, and Joseph J. Darlington, executors, parties to this suit and process be issued against them.

E. H. THOMAS,
Attorney for Plaintiff.

SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 5, 1909.

Session resumed, pursuant to adjournment, Hon. Harry M. Clabaugh, chief justice, presiding.

* * * * * * *

Comes now the plaintiff, by its attorney, Mr. E. H. Thomas, and suggests the death of the defendant herein, Charles B. Church, and showing to the court that Charles W. Church, William A. H. Church, Mary A. Church, and Joseph J. Darlington have duly qualified as executors of the estate of Charles B. Church, deceased, moves that said executors be made parties defendant, whereupon it is ordered that said executors be, and are hereby, made parties defendant in the place and stead of said Charles B. Church, deceased. Further, leave is hereby granted plaintiff to forthwith file an amendment to the amended declaration herein.

AMENDMENT TO AMENDED DECLARATION, FILED JANUARY 5, 1909.

* * * * * * *

Now comes the plaintiff, District of Columbia, by leave of court first had and obtained, and amends its amended declaration filed in this cause as follows:

1. Amend the paragraph in said amended declaration denominated "First" by adding, after the word "Columbia," in the third line thereof, the words "which came into his hands."

2. Amend the paragraph in said amended declaration denominated "Second" by adding, after the word "Columbia," in the second line thereof, the words "which came into his hands."

3. Amend the paragraph in said amended declaration denominated "Third" by adding, after the word "Columbia," in the second line thereof, the words "which came into his hands."

4. Amend the paragraph in said amended declaration denominated "Fourth" by adding, after the word "Columbia," at the end of the second line thereof, the words "which came into his hands."

5. Amend the paragraph in said amended declaration denominated "Fifth" by adding, after the word "Columbia," in the second line thereof, the words "which came into his hands."

6. Amend the paragraph in said amended declaration denominated "Fifth" as follows: Strike out the word "or" in the phrase "that said checks or proceeds were unlawfully used" and insert in lieu thereof the word "and," so that the said phrase shall read "that said checks and proceeds were unlawfully used," in the eighth and ninth lines of said paragraph of amended declaration.

MOTION OF PETTY TO STRIKE OUT LEAVE TO AMEND, ETC., FILED APRIL 21, 1909.

* * * * * * *

Now comes the defendant James T. Petty, appearing by his attorney specially for this purpose and for no other, and moves the court to vacate the order passed in the above cause on the 5th day of January, 1909, granting the plaintiff leave to amend upon the following grounds:

1. Because said motion was granted without notice to this defendant, and without opportunity to be heard.

2. Because of the rendition of a final judgment in said cause against the plaintiff on, to wit, the 18th day of October, 1907, or more than three terms before the passage of the said order of January 5, 1909, which judgment was not followed by any other or further proceeding in the cause during the term in which it was rendered nor for a long time, to wit, for more than a year thereafter.

3. Because there was and is no cause pending in this court in which any such order could be granted.

4. Because the court was without jurisdiction to pass any such order.

5. Because the said order was improvidently granted.

IN THE COURT OF APPEALS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

District of Columbia, a municipal corporation, appellant, v. James T. Petty, Charles W. Church, William A. H. Cuhrch et al. No. 2215.

OPINION.

Mr. Justice Robb delivered the opinion of the court:

* * * * * * *

This is an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of the District sustaining the demurrer to appellant's declaration in an action upon the official bond of appellee Petty, as auditor of the District, demurrers to the original and first amended declaration having been previously sustained. Motion further to amend was denied.

The original declaration was filed November 9, 1903, and alleged that Petty, as principal, and Church, Wilson, and Deering, as sureties, executed a bond on May 1, 1888, the material part of which reads as follows:

"Whereas the above bounden James T. Petty has been appointed to the office of auditor in and for the District of Columbia, it is therein set forth as follows:

"Now, therefore, the condition of said obligation is such that if said James T. Petty shall faithfully and efficiently perform all the duties of his said office, as provided for by law, and the rules and regulations from time to time duly prescribed for the government of the civil service of said District, and shall well and truly pay over, disburse, and account for all moneys that shall come to his hands, as the law and orders governing said service shall require, then said obligation to be void; otherwise to remain in full force."

The original declaration alleged the failure on the part of Petty to perform "all the duties of his said office as provided by law," failure faithfully and efficiently to observe "the said rules and regulations," and failure and neglect truly "to pay over, disburse, and account for all moneys that came into his hands, as the law and orders governing his duties and services required," in this:

First. That he failed to account for moneys of the District of Columbia represented by 10 checks of specified amounts and dates drawn by Charles C. Rogers, disbursing officer, or his deputy, countersigned by Petty as auditor, or by the Acting Auditor of the Treasury of the United States, charged to the "Permit fund, District of Columbia," which checks should have been deposited by Petty as auditor, in accordance with law and the rules governing the conduct of his office, with the Treasurer of the United States to the credit of the appropriation "Improvements and repairs, District of Columbia, assessment and permit work"; that said checks were not so deposited, but were indosed by Petty as auditor as aforesaid, cashed at the Central National Bank of Washington, and their proceeds never accounted for to the District of Columbia or deposited in any bank or in the Treasury of the United States to its credit.

Second. That Petty, as auditor, failed to account for moneys of the District represented by 15 checks of specified dates and amounts, drawn and countersigned as above stated and charged to various appropriations of the District of Columbia and indorsed by Petty as auditor, and which should, "in accordance with law and the rules and regulations aforesaid, have been deposited in the Traders' National Bank, of Washington, D. C., as reimbursements of the deposit and assessment fund"; that said checks were not so deposited, but after indorsement as aforesaid "were cashed at the Central National Bank of Washington, D. C., and the proceeds of said checks so cashed were never in any manner paid or accounted for to the said plaintiff."

Third. That Petty, as auditor, failed to account for moneys of the District of Columbia represented by nine checks of specified dates and amounts drawn by him as auditor to his order as auditor upon the Central National Bank of Washington, D. C., charged to the account of said auditor in said bank and intended for deposit in the Traders' National Bank of Washington, D. C., to reimburse the deposit and assessment fund, where said fund was kept; that said checks, after indorsement by Petty, were not so deposited but were cashed at said Central National Bank of Washington and their proceeds never paid or accounted for to the District of Columbia.

Fourth. That Petty, as auditor, failed to account for other moneys of the District of Columbia represented by six checks of specified dates and amounts drawn by him as auditor, the first three upon said Central National Bank and the last three upon the National Capital Bank of Washington, all payable to his order as auditor; that said checks drawn as aforesaid should have been deposited at the said banks to Petty's credit as auditor; that they were not so deposited, but, after indorsement, were cashed at the Central National Bank and the proceeds never paid or accounted for to the District of Columbia.

Fifth. That Petty, as auditor, failed to account for other moneys of the District represented by two checks of stated dates and amounts drawn by him as auditor upon the Central National Bank, payable to his order "as disbursing agent, Rock Creek Park, D. C."; that the said checks, or the proceeds thereof, were used by the said Petty in his capacity as such disbursing agent, and the said checks so drawn by him as auditor were drawn without authority of law and the proceeds thereof were never in any manner repaid or accounted for to the said plaintiff.

To this declaration a demurrer was filed by the sureties on June 22, 1902, upon the ground that there was no law, nor any rule or regulation pleaded, under which Petty was chargeable with the custody or otherwise accountable for any of the moneys mentioned in the declaration; in other words, the question raised by the first demurrer was whether, in the absence of controlling statutory provisions, it was necessary to plead the rules and regulations under which it was claimed Petty became the custodian of and accountable for the moneys in the declaration mentioned. Judgment of the court sustaining this demurrer was entered February 16, 1906, whereupon on March 16 following leave to amend was sought and obtained.

The first amended declaration was filed on December 12, 1906. In this amended declaration the alleged breaches were copied verbatim from the original declaration, but were preceded by a summary of the statutes, rules, and regulations thought to apply to the office of auditor of the District of Columbia, and which will be noticed later. To this amended declaration the sureties again demurred upon the ground stated in the demurrer to the original declaration, the defendant also demurring. The court, on October 18, 1907, sustained the demurrer.

On January 5, 1909, the death of Mr. Church, one of said sureties, was suggested, and his executors were ordered to be made parties. Upon the same date leave was sought and obtained to file a second amended declaration, the amendment consisting of the addition of the words "which came into his hands" in each of the five assignments of breach, so that each of said assignments read, "that said defendant Petty, as auditor aforesaid, failed to account for moneys of the District of Columbia which came into his hands, represented by checks of amounts, dates, and numbers given below," etc, and, secondly, by striking out the word "or" in the fifth assignment of breach, so that the clause in which it occurs reads "that said checks and proceeds" were used. To this declaration another demurrer was filed upon the ground previously alleged. On March 4, 1910, the court, after hearing, again sustained the demurrer, whereupon motion for leave to amend was again made, and on June 17, 1910, this motion was denied and judgment given for the defendants, from which judgment this appeal was taken.

Appellees make no question as to the right of the District to take the bond in suit, their sole contention being that the declaration states no breach of it. The first question, therefore, which logically presents itself is whether, in an action of this kind, where liability depends upon prescribed rules or regulations, recovery can be had unless such rules and regulations are pleaded. A careful review of the authorities leaves no room for doubt upon this question. The rule, as stated by Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations, is that "the acts, votes, and ordinances of the corporation are not public matters, and must, unless otherwise provided by statute, be pleaded and proved." (1 Dill. Mun. Corp., sec. 83, 4th ed.) In Robinson v. Tramway Co. (164 Fed. 174), Judge Van Devanter, now Mr. Justice Van Devanter of the Supreme Court of the United States, said: "An ordinance is not a public statute, but a mere municipal regulation, and to make it available in establishing a charge of negligence it must be pleaded, like any other fact of which judicial notice will not be taken. Here it was not pleaded, and so could not be proven."

"The general rule is well settled (citing cases) that municipal ordinances and by-laws are not laws of which judicial notice will be taken, but facts to be pleaded and proven. If not duly pleaded, they can not be proven." (Cyc., vol. 28, p. 393.)

In Sittgen v. Rundle (99 Wis., 78), damages were sought for an alleged false imprisonment, and the trial court ruled that plaintiff's arrest was without due process and that he was entitled to recover damages from the officer arresting him. In the appellate court it was argued that this ruling was erroneous, owing to an ordinance of the city of Milwaukee granting authority to policemen of that city to make arrests in cases of misdemeanor. The court said: "The ordinance was not mentioned in the pleadings or introduced in evidence, the first makes its appearance in the case when printed in appellant's brief. The obligations of courts are sufficiently burdensome when they are required to take cognizance of all acts granting powers to municipal corporations. They have uniformly refused to take notice of the acts and ordinances of such bodies except upon due proof. (Citations.) And the introduction of such an ordinance in evidence when not pleaded, against proper objection, is error."

In Porter v. Waring (69 N. Y., 250) it was said: "If the court could — judicial notice of the ordinances of a municipal corporation, it would involve consideration of all the numerous enactments, whether printed or otherwise, which the common council have adopted and which relate to the subject of the controversy, and the existence of many of which might be entirely unknown to the parties or their counsel."

While some of the cases hold that ordinances must be set on in haec verba, we think the general rule to be that it is sufficient to set forth their provisions in substance. (Railroad Co. v. Ashline, admx., 171 Ill., 313; Kip v. Paterson, 26 N. J. L., 142; Decker v. McSorley, 11 Wis., 91; Wagner v. Garrett, 118 Ind., 114; Lexington v. Woolfolk, 117 Ky., 708.) They must be carefully identified, however, that they may be found without difficulty.

We will next review the history of the office of auditor and the rules and regulations governing the same, as given in the amended declaration. The act of July 7, 1870 (16 Stat., 191), authorized the mayor and aldermen of the city of Washington to appoint an auditor and comptroller, and made it the duty of the auditor to audit and certify to the comptroller all accounts against the corporation and to retain the originals of all contracts made and orders given for work and improvement by the District. It was the duty of the comptroller to keep an account of all warrants, of all taxes levied, and all receipts for taxes given by the collector and register. The act further provided that every account against the corporation of Washington, when audited and certified by the auditor, should be paid by warrant of the comptroller, countersigned by the mayor. The act provided, however, that all moneys received from any and all sources should be deposited by the collector and register to the credit of the city in a designated depository.

Under the act of February 21, 1871 (16 Stat., 419), the District of Columbia was created a body corporate for municipal purposes, and the power of election and appointment of municipal officers was lodged in its legislature, the act repealing the charter of the city of Washington and abolishing all offices of that corporation after June 7, 1871. The act of the legislative assembly of August 23, 1871 (Abert's Compilation, p. 210), made it the duty of the auditor to audit all accounts against the District, to keep a record of all bills certified by him and the appropriations to which they are chargeable, to certify to the comptroller all accounts audited by him, and to countersign all warrants drawn by the comptroller, if found correct. The comptroller was to keep an account of all appropriations made by the legislative assembly and of all evidences of indebtedness issued by the District, to keep a transcript of all assessments of taxes, to charge to the respective appropriations all payments made upon certificate of the auditor, and to draw warrants upon the treasurer therefor if there was a balance to the credit of the particular appropriation.

The act of June 20, 1870 (18 Stat., 116), abolished the existing form of government and established the present system. This act authorized the commissioners to abolish and consolidate offices and make appropriations thereto. The declaration alleges that the board of commissioners consolidated the office of auditor and comptroller and deputy comptroller by order of August 11, 1876, and by order of August 19, 1876, modified that order so as to continue the office of auditor and comptroller and appointed one person to perform the duties of both offices. Under said order of August 11, which is set out in the declaration, it is provided "that the clerk in the auditor's office who shall be charged with the business of special assessments shall give a bond to the District of Columbia" for the faithful performance of his duties. Said order of August 19 provided that "the clerk in the auditor's office who shall be charged with the business of collecting and accounting for special assessments shall give a bond to the District of Columbia" for the faithful performance of his duties.

The act of June 11, 1878 (20 Stat., 102), continued the existing form of government by commissioners and provided that all taxes should be paid into the Treasury of the United States and that the same, as well as appropriations to be made by Congress, should be disbursed for the expenses of the District on itemized vouchers audited and approved by the auditor of the District and certified by the commissioners or a majority of them.

The act of Congress of March 3, 1881 (21 Stat., 466), provided that accounts of all disbursements of the commissioners of the District should be made to the accounting officers of the Treasury by the auditor on vouchers certified by the commissioners as required by law. The same provision is also contained in section 3 of the act of Congress of July 1, 1882. (22 Stat., 144.) These enactments were followed by an order of the commissioners dated December 8, 1882, abolishing the office of comptroller and imposing his duties upon the auditor.

Such was the situation when the bond was given. The declaration then sets out that on June 13, 1888, the commissioners passed an order containing seven sections. An inspection of the order, which is made a part of the declaration, shows that under section 1 the collector of taxes was required, upon receiving a deposit for permit work, etc., to give receipts therefor in duplicate, delivering the original to the depositor and transmitting the duplicate to the auditor. This section forbids the collector to pay out moneys thus received except upon requisition of the auditor, approved by the commissioners. Section 2 of the order required the superintendents of streets and sewers, respectively, to prepare in duplicate pay rolls or other vouchers for services rendered or materials furnished, payable from the permit fund, which, after approval by the commissioners, were to be "forwarded to the auditor for audit and payment." This section, however, was followed by section 3, requiring the auditor, after receiving a pay roll or other voucher prepared in accordance with section 2, to examine and approve the same if found correct, and make requisition upon the collector of taxes for the amount thereof as provided in section 1, and by section 4 specifying the manner in which these moneys should be paid, and by whom. That section required "the pay clerk of the auditor's office" to take the rolls thus prepared, with the money necessary to meet the same, to the place where the work was being done and to pay in cash to each claimant the amount his due. This pay clerk was required to give a bond for the faithful performance of the duties required of him. Section 5 required the auditor to open an account with the collector of taxes, debiting him with all deposits on account of permit work and license funds and subsequent deposits, crediting the requisitions honored by the collector. Section 6 required the auditor to debit himself with moneys received from the collector of taxes, upon requisitions made as provided in section 1, and to credit himself with payments upon vouchers duly certified and approved as in sections 2 and 7. The seventh and last section, which, however, is not here involved, required the auditor, after the completion of the work for which the deposit had been made, to state an account with the depositor and make requisition for any balance or deposit, the receipt of the depositor being the auditor's voucher for such payment.

What constituted "permit work," the deposits on account of which made up the "permit fund," is gathered from the statement in the declaration that in the course of administration "the commissioners found it expedient that all work done by the District of Columbia as the result of cuts made in streets, avenues, roads, and alleys in said District, be paid from the fund known as the 'deposit and assessment fund,' which was whole-cost work," done at the solicitation of individual citizens for their benefit and at their expense.

The act of Congress of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat., 1064), provided "for one disbursing clerk," and authorized him to pay laborers and employees of the District, such payments to be made "with moneys advanced to him by the commissioners in their discretion, upon pay rolls or other vouchers audited and approved by the auditor of the District of Columbia and certified by the commissioners as now required by law." This disbursing clerk was required to give bond to the satisfaction of the commissioners in the sum of $25,000, and it was expressly provided that he should be subordinate to the commissioners and that they should "in every respect be responsible to the United States, the District of Columbia, and to individuals for the acts and doings of said disbursing clerk." The accounts of this disbursing clerk were to be audited by the auditor of the District, who, however, was required to forward such accounts to the commissioners for their approval. This disbursing clerk, it is alleged in the declaration, was the officer designated in said order of June 13, 1888, as "pay clerk."

The act of August 7, 1894 (28 Stat., 247), provided for so-called "half-cost" work by requiring property owners desiring improvements under the permit system to deposit in advance with the collector an amount equal to one-half of the cost of such improvements. Moneys thus received by the collector were to be deposited by him in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the permit fund. Upon the completion of the work the commissioners were required to repay the current appropriation for assessment and permit work out of such permit fund one-half the cost of such work and return to the depositors from the same fund any surplus remaining over and above one-half of the cost of the work. It will be noticed that this statute was not enacted until several years after the promulgation of said order of June 13, 1888, and was authority for half-cost and not whole-cost work.

The declaration alleges that on the 6th of February, 1897, the commissioners passed an order providing that for convenience in keeping the account "in case of repairs made by the District of cuts in pavements and other work done by the District, which were paid for from private deposits, a general account be opened styled 'Deposit and Assessment Fund,' and that all material and labor for such works to be charged against said account and to be paid by assessments against the deposits made for such purposes."

The act of June 30, 1898 (30 Stat., 525), provided for the appointment by the Commissioners of the District of a disbursing officer for the District, who was required to give bond in the sum of $50,000. This act expressly provided that thereafter advances in money should be made "on the requisition of said commissioners to the said disbursing officer instead of to the commissioners," and required him to account for the same as then "required by law of the said commissioners."

The only other act necessary to be noticed is the act of July 1, 1902 (32 Stat., 592), requiring the auditor of the District to continue to prepare and countersign all checks issued by the disbursing officer, no check of such officer involving the disbursement of public moneys to be valid unless so countersigned.

It is of course axiomatic that while duties akin to those expressly imposed upon a bonded officer may be subsequently devolved upon him so as to charge his sureties, duties of a wholly different character may not, the reason being that one class of duties may reasonably be presumed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties at the time of the execution of the bond, while the other class may not. (Gasson v. United States, 97 U. S., 584; 2 Brandt S. & G., sec. 660.) The question before us in this case, however, is not so much whether there has been a breach of any after-imposed duties on the part of the auditor as whether, upon this record, it can be said that responsibility for the custody of the moneys mentioned in the declaration in any way devolved upon him.

It is so apparent, we think, as to render discussion unnecessary that down to the promulgation of said order of June 13, 1888, there was no law, rule, or regulation making the auditor of the District custodian or accountable for public moneys. It is insisted by the appellees that the whole-cost work, to which the "permit-work" deposit mentioned in this order was devoted, was entirely unauthorized by law, and hence that the order is not material here. We can find no statute authorizing the District to receive or expend such permit-work deposits. On the contrary, the commissioners were prohibited for contracting for improvement of streets, etc., except in pursuance of appropriations made by law." (Abert's Compilation, chap. 19, secs. 29, 31, pp. 201–202.) The order, therefore, has no place in this inquiry as the moneys received from citizens for street improvement were not public moneys in any legal sense. The transaction was between the individuals holding the office of commissioner and the citizens who advanced the money.

The act of 1891, making appropriation "for one disbursing clerk," provided that payments to laborers and employees should be made by such clerk with moneys advanced to him not by the auditor, but by the commissioners. This disbursing clerk was also, under the act, required to give bond to the United States, and was made subordinate not to the auditor but to the commissioners. His derelictions the act expressly charged not to the auditor but to the commissioners. The auditor was required to audit the accounts of this disbursing clerk, but again the act placed responsibility upon the commissioners by requiring the auditor promptly to forward such accounts to them for approval. From 1891 to the act of June 30, 1898, it is conceded there was no change in the method of disbursement. That act, as noted, created a disbursing officer for the District, required him to be appointed by the commissioners, and required him to give bond for the faithful performance of his duties "in the disbursing and accounting, according to law, for all moneys of the United States and of the District of Columbia that may come into his hands." The proviso following that advances in money should be made to the disbursing officer "instead of to the commissioners," and that he should account for such moneys "as now required by law of said commissioners," negatives the contention that it was then understood that advances had previously been made to the auditor and is in affirmation of the proposition that such advances had previously been made to the commissioners.

The declaration specifically assigns, as the breach for which recovery is sought, the failure on the part of the auditor to account for certain checks alleged to represent moneys. The exact nature of these various transactions is set out in the declaration. There was no law making it the duty of the auditor to have the custody of or to disburse any of these moneys, nor does the declaration, as we have found, set out any prescribed rule, order, or regulation imposing said duties, or either of them, upon the auditor. It follows, therefore, that the demurrer was rightly sustained.

The refusal of the court to permit still further amendment of the declaration is assigned as error. While it is difficult to perceive how the defect in the declaration could be overcome by amendment, we are certainly not prepared to hold that there was an abuse of discretion by the trial court in overruling the motion. Almost eight years had intervened since the filing of the original declaration. An oral motion for leave to file a third amendment was made, unaccompanied—so far as the record discloses—by any showing of cause or by any suggestion as to the character of the proposed amendment. In the circumstances, the court was entirely justified in overruling the motion.

(Indorsed:) No. 2215. District of Columbia, a municipal corporation, appellant, v. James T. Petty et al. Opinion of the court per Mr. Justice Robb. Court of Appeals, District of Columbia. Filed May 1, 1911. Henry W. Hodges, clerk.

MONDAY, May 1, A. D. 1911.

District of Columbia, a municipal corporation, appellant, v. James T. Petty, Charles W. Church, William A. H. Church, et al. No. 2215. April term, 1911.

APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof it is now here ordered and adjudged by this court that the judgment of the said supreme court in this cause be, and the same is hereby, affirmed with costs.

Per Mr. JUSTICE ROBB,
May 1, 1911.

IN THE COURT OF APPEALS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

District of Columbia, a municipal corporation, appellant, v. James T. Petty, Charles W. Church, William A. H. Church, Mary A. Church, and Joseph J. Darlington, executors of Charles B. Church, Jesse B. Wilson, and George T. Dearing, appellees. No. 2215.

PETITION FOR WRIT OF ERROR.

And now comes the District of Columbia, a municipal corporation, plaintiff herein, and says:

That on or about the 1st day of May, 1911, the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia entered a judgment herein in favor of the above-named defendants against the plaintiff, in which judgment and the proceedings had prior thereto in this case certain errors were committed to the prejudice of this plaintiff, all of which will more in detail appear from the assignment of errors which is filed with this petition.

Wherefore this plaintiff prays that a writ of error may issue in this behalf out of the Supreme Court of the United States for the correction of errors so complained of, and that a transcript of the record, proceedings, and papers in this cause, duly authenticated, may be sent to the Supreme Court of the United States.

EDWARD H. THOMAS,
Corporation Counsel, Attorney for Plaintiff.

IN THE COURT OF APPEALS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

District of Columbia, a municipal corporation, appellant, v. James T. Petty, Charles W. Church, William A. H. Church, Mary A. Church, and Joseph J. Darlington, executors of Charles B. Church, Jesse B. Wilson, and George T. Dearing, appellees. No. 2215.

ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS.

The plaintiff, the District of Columbia, a municipal corporation, in connection with and as part of its partition for writ of error filed herein, makes the following assignment of errors, which it avers were committed by the court in the rendition of the judgment against this plaintiff appearing of record herein, that is to say:

First. The court erred in holding and deciding that the original declaration of the plaintiff and as amended did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendants.

Second. The court erred in holding and deciding that there is no law nor any rule or regulation pleaded under which the defendant, Petty, and his sureties were chargeable with the custody of, or otherwise accountable for, any of the moneys in said original declaration and the amendments thereto mentioned.

Third. The court erred in holding and deciding that the action was founded on failure to observe the rules and regulations from time to time prescribed for the government of the civil service of the District of Columbia and that it was necessary to plead such rules and regulations, and in failing to hold that said Petty was liable for not accounting for all moneys that came into his possession or that the purpose of the bond was to hold him for all public moneys received by him.

Fourth. The court erred in holding and deciding that the condition of the bond in suit did not cover breaches under laws and regulations enacted and in force subsequent to the execution of the bond.

Fifth, the court erred in holding and deciding that the moneys which came into the hands of said Petty could not be disbursed except by congressional appropriation.

Sixth, the court erred in not holding and deciding that the bond in suit was good although not a statutory bond and that the principal and sureties were estopped to deny its validity.

Seventh, the court erred in sustaining the demurrers of the defendants to the original declaration and the amendments thereto and in rendering judgment for the defendants.

Wherefore the plaintiff prays that the said judgment may be reversed.

Darlington, executors of Charles B. Church, Jesse B. Wilson, and George T. Dearing, appellees. Petition for writ of error and assignment of errors. Court of appeals, District of Columbia. Filed May 12, 1911. Henry W. Hodges, clerk.

FRIDAY, MAY 12, A. D. 1911.

District of Columbia, a municipal corporation, appellant, v. James T. Petty, Charles W. Church, William A. H. Church, et al. No. 2215.

On motion of Mr. William H. White, of counsel for the appellant, it is ordered by the court that a writ of error to remove this cause to the Supreme Court of the United States issue.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, ss:

The President of the United States to the honorable the justices of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, greeting:

Because in the record and proceedings, as also in the rendition of the judgment of a plea which is in the said court of appeals before you, or some of you, between District of Columbia, a municipal corporation, appellant, and James T. Petty, Charles W. Church, William A. H. Church, et al., appellees, a manifest error hath happened, to the great damage of the said appellant as by its complaint appears. We being willing that error, if any hath been, should be duly corrected, and full and speedy justice done to the parties aforesaid in this behalf, do command you, if judgment be therein given, that then under your seal, distinctly and openly, you send the record and proceedings aforesaid, with all things concerning the same, to the Supreme Court of the United States, together with this writ, so that you have the same in the said Supreme Court at Washington within 30 days from the date thereof, that the record and proceedings aforesaid being inspected, the said Supreme Court may cause further to be done therein to correct that error, what of right, and according to the laws and customs of the United States should be done.

Witness the Hon. Edward D. White, Chief Justice of the United States, the 12th day of May, in the year of our Lord 1911.

COURT OF APPEALS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

I, Henry W. Hodges, clerk of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, do hereby certify that the foregoing printed and typewritten pages numbered from 1 to 53, inclusive, contain a true copy of the transcript of record and proceedings of said court of appeals in the case of the District of Columbia, a municipal corporation, appellant, v. James T. Petty, Charles W. Church, William A. H. Church, et al., No. 2215, April term, 1911, as the same remain upon the files and records of said court of appeals.

In testimony whereof I hereunto subscribe my name and affix the seal of said court of appeals, at the city of Washington, this 16th day of May, A. D. 1911.

[SEAL COURT OF APPEALS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.]

HENRY W. HODGES,
Clerk of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

Indorsed on cover: File No. 22,723. District of Columbia Court of Appeals. Term No. 647. The District of Columbia, plaintiff in error, v. James T. Petty; Charles W. Church et al., executors of Charles B. Church, deceased; Jesse B. Wilson and George T. Dearing. Filed June 7, 1911. File No. 22,723.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not think the point of order on my amendment was sustained. I think it is too late. He reserved the point of order and did not make it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] reserved a point of order. The gentleman from Maryland was heard on it, and the gentleman from Kentucky rose and renewed the point of order, and the Chair sustained it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment. After line 9, page 7, I wish to offer the amendment down to and including the figures "$47,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Where is "$47,000"?

Mr. LINTHICUM. In the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, at the end of line 9, insert the following:

"For the erection of shelters on the open space at the intersection of Ohio and Louisiana Avenues with Tenth and Twelfth Streets, bounded by Tenth and Twelfth and B and Little B Streets NW., known and designated as the farmers' produce market, and the necessary paving in connection therewith, $47,000."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the item for the reason that it increases an expenditure besides being legislation. An amendment is in order to reduce an appropriation, but an amendment is not in order to enlarge one. It is also new legislation.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I understand that to be the case. If the amendment is germane to the bill, I do not see why we have not the right to amend and increase the appropriation. This is not to increase any specific appropriation. It is making an entirely separate appropriation for the protection of the farmers who bring their produce to that market. It seems to me from what the gentleman from Maryland, my colleague [Mr. LEWIS], has said that that protection should certainly be given to these farmers. If we want the farmers to bring their produce and sell it directly to the consumer, certainly every convenience ought to be offered for that provision, just as we are giving protection to those people who are selling in the inclosed markets. I do not see that the gentleman's point of order is well taken there.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. However meritorious the gentleman's amendment might be, that is not for the Chair to pass upon. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fish wharf and market: Market master and wharfinger, who shall have charge of the landing of vessels, the collection of wharfage and dockage rentals, and the collection of rents for fish houses at the municipal fish wharf and market hereinafter established, for not exceeding 16 months at the rate of $75 per month, beginning March 1, 1913, $1,200; assistant market master, who shall also act as laborer, for the same period, at the rate of $50 per month, not exceeding $800; in all $2,000, to be immediately available; and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized and directed in the name of the District of Columbia to take over, exclusively control, regulate, and operate as a municipal fish wharf and market, the water frontage on the Potomac River lying south of Water Street, between Eleventh and Twelfth Streets, including the buildings and wharves thereon, and said wharf shall constitute the sole wharf for the landing of fish and oysters for sale in the District of Columbia; and said commissioners shall have power to make leases, fix and determine rentals, wharfage and dockage fees, and to collect and pay the same into the Treasury, one-half to the credit of the United States and one-half to the credit of the District of Columbia, and to make and amend, from time to time, all such regulations as they may deem proper for the control, regulation, and operation of said municipal fish wharf and market; and all leases, subleases, and other private rights of occupancy in and to any or all of said property are terminated on, from, and after March 15, 1913; and all laws and parts of laws requiring the advertisement and sale of rights and privileges for a fish wharf or dock, and all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions hereof are repealed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I make a point of order against the paragraph because it is legislation.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. I want to ask the gentleman whether he will permit the House to pass upon the proposition if I can satisfy him that this is meritorious?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, there is one feature in it that I wish to speak of. It is admitted that for the purpose of landing oyster boats and vessels down there about $7,000 a year is collected. That $7,000 a year goes on the price of oysters and fish in the city of Washington, and I very much doubt the propriety of it.

Mr. BURLESON. Does the gentleman understand that this fish wharf is now under the control of a private contractor, and that his contract will expire on the 15th day of March of this year, and that the District derives a revenue at this time of only about $1,200 a year, with the addition of $210, and that under the new scheme the District would derive a revenue of six or seven thousand dollars which now goes to the private contractor? The same burden may hereafter rest upon the consumer, it is true, after the authorities have taken it over, but instead of the revenue now being derived going into the pockets of a private individual we have a new plan whereby it would go into the treasury of the District government. In addition thereto, a very insanitary condition exists at the fish-market wharf at this time, and we hope to correct it by the municipal authorities taking control.

I will say to the gentleman that if he will look into the proposition—if he will reserve his point of order and look into the proposition—and does not then say that it is meritorious, I shall not contend with him about the matter. But I would like, if the gentleman will permit it, for the members of the subcommittee to explain the matter to the House just as it is, and let the House pass on it as to whether or not it shall continue in the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I have already looked into the subject.

Mr. BURLESON. It is subject to a point of order, I admit.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They are contemplating the erection of very costly buildings down there. This lease will expire in a few months, and the property will become public, and no private individual will derive any rents from it. But the District Commissioners contemplate the erection of costly buildings there, and the hiring of a number of men to take charge of them, and will impose a tax of several thousand dollars a year on the people of Washington for their fish and oysters.

Mr. BURLESON. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman is wholly mistaken about it. There is no contemplation on the part of the commissioners to erect any character of buildings there at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then I misread what is in the Book of Estimates, as sent here by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the recommendation of the Commissioners of the District, and there is also much in the hearings relative to it.

Mr. BURLESON. I will state to the gentleman that during the hearings, as I recall, nothing was said about the erection of costly buildings, or buildings of any character whatever.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is all there.

Mr. BURLESON. The only difference between the future conditions and the conditions that exist there now will be that, instead of being controlled by a private contractor, it will be controlled by the municipality.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Does the gentleman contend that the private contractor will have anything to do with this property after the lease expires?

Mr. BURLESON. He will not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then that settles it.

Mr. BURLESON. He will not; but we will be compelled to re-advertise and permit another contractor to operate this fish wharf, because the service must be rendered to the people of the District.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Then do not let them have it for $1,200 when it is worth $6,000 or $7,000.

Mr. BURLESON. I will state to the gentleman that the District Commissioners, under the operation of the law, will be compelled, unless we can embody this item in the bill, to re-lease this fish wharf.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am not sure that the gentleman is correct in that. I think it requires an act of Congress to again lease it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Engineer Commissioner's office: Engineer of highways, $3,000; engineer of bridges, $2,250; superintendent of streets, $2,000; superintendent of suburban roads, $2,300; superintendent of sewers, $3,300; inspector of asphalts and cements, $2,400 (Provided, That the inspector of asphalts and cements shall not receive or accept compensation of any kind from, or perform any work or render any services of a character required of him officially by the District of Columbia to, any person, firm, corporation, or municipality other than the District of Columbia); assistant inspector of asphalts and cements, $1,500; superintendent of trees and parkings, $2,000; assistant superintendent of trees and parkings, $1,200; assistant engineers—1 $2,200, 1 $2,100, 4 at $1,800 each, 2 at $1,600 each, 4 at $1,500 each, 1 $1,350, 1 $1,200; transitmen—2 at $1,200 each, 1 $1,050; rodmen—4 at $900 each, 8 at $780 each, 12 chainmen at $650 each; draftsmen—1 $1,500, 1 $1,350, 2 at $1,200 each, 1 $1,050; general inspector of sewers, $1,300; inspector of sewers, $1,200; bridge inspector, $1,200; inspectors—2 at $1,500 each, 6, including 3 inspectors of streets, at $1,200 each, 1 $1,000, 1 $900; foremen—12 at $1,200 each, 1 $1,050, 10 at $900 each; foreman, Rock Creek Park, $1,200; 3 subforemen, at $1,050 each; bridge keepers—1 $650, 3 at $600 each; chief clerk, $2,250; permit clerk, $1,500; assistant permit clerk, $1,000; index clerk and typewriter, $900; clerks—1 $1,800, 3 at $1,500 each, 2 at $1,400 each, 5 at $1,200 each, 2 at $1,000 each, 1 $900, 1 $840, 2 at $750 each, 1 $600; messengers—1 $600, 6 at $540 each; skilled laborers—1 $625, 2 at $600 each; janitor, $720; principal steam engineer, $1,800; 3 steam engineers, at 1,200 each; 3 assistant steam engineers, at $1,050 each; 6 oilers, at $600 each; 6 firemen, at $875 each; inspector, $1,400; storekeeper, $900; superintendent of stables, $1,500; blacksmith, $975; 2 watchmen, at $630 each; 2 drivers, at $630 each; inspector of gas and meters, $2,000; assistant inspectors of gas and meters—1 $1,000, 2 at $900 each; messenger, $600; in all, $180,710.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that part of this paragraph in line 7, page 9, superintendent of suburban roads, $2,300. This salary is increased from $2,000 to $2,300.

Mr. BURLESON. That is true. Does the gentleman desire to know the reason why?

Mr. FOWLER. I will reserve the point of order, if the gentleman desires to have me do so.

Mr. BURLESON. I do not desire to consume the time of the Committee of the Whole if the gentleman is going to make the point of order anyway.

Mr. FOWLER. I am going to make the point of order. I have looked into the matter.

Mr. BURLESON. If, in spite of any explanation I might make, the gentleman is going to make the point of order, I have nothing to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BURLESON. In line 7, page 9, after the word "roads," where the blank has been created by the words stricken out under the point of order, I move to insert the figures "$2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 7, after the word "roads," at the end of the line, insert "$2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Municipal architect's office: Municipal architect, $3,600; superintendent of construction, $2,000; chief draftsman, $1,700; draftsmen—1 $1,400, 1 $1,300; heating, ventilating, and sanitary engineer, $2,000; superintendent of repairs, $1,800; assistant superintendent of repairs, $1,200; boss carpenter, boss tinner, boss painter, boss plumber, boss steam fitter, 5 in all, at $1,200 each; boss grader, $1,000; machinist, $1,200; clerks—1 $1,050, 1 $620; copyist, $840; driver, $540; in all, $26,250.

Mr. FOWLER. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I make a point of order against that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is legislation in it, increasing a salary from $1,600 to $1,800, on page 10, line 24.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] desire to be heard?

Mr. BURLESON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BURLESON. I offer an amendment. After the word "repairs," in line 24, insert the words "$1,600" in the blank caused by sustaining the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk reads as follows:

Page 10, line 24, after the word "repairs," insert "$1,600."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In the former bill this language appears:

Municipal architect's office: Municipal architect, whose duty hereafter shall be to prepare or supervise the preparation of plans for and superintend the construction of all municipal buildings, and the repair and improvement of all buildings belonging to the District of Columbia, and serve under the direction of the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, $3,600.

I would ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] who has charge of this bill whether or not, in his opinion, the leaving out of those words will lessen the duties of the municipal architect?

Mr. BURLESON. It will not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am rather inclined to that belief. In fact, I feel reasonably certain of it, because of the use of the word "hereafter" in the former appropriation. But while we are upon this subject I desire to state that while the law is that the municipal architect shall prepare all the plans and specifications, notwithstanding that fact the Commissioners of the District of Columbia paid out for architect's fees—

Notwithstanding there is this law staring the commissioners in the face they have paid out that large sum of money for architects' service.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. When were these amounts that the gentleman has just stated paid out?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. During the present term of the municipal architect.

Mr. MANN. I think this provision as permanent law has not been in very long.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not know how long, but I asked the commissioners to furnish me with the amounts that the architect's office had paid out during this time, and this is what I have just read.

Mr. MANN. The provision went in as permanent law last summer. I would like to ask the gentleman whether this provision was carried in the bill before; I know there was some contest about it in the House. Were these amounts paid out before it became permanent law?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; they were not; I am quite sure.

Mr. MANN. It was not made permanent law until last summer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think not, because I hold in my hand a letter dated August 9, 1909, addressed to the Commissioners of the District, signed by Mr. Tweedale, as auditor of the District of Columbia, overruling the items, which the commissioners afterwards paid. I wish to make that letter a part of my remarks.

In that letter the auditor plainly told the commissioners that these fees were being illegally paid, and refused to let them pass through his office. They took an appeal from his decision, and Mr. R. J. Tracewell, Comptroller of the Treasury, overruled the auditor of the District of Columbia and permitted them to pay.

Mr. COX. What is the date of that decision?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The date of the decision is August 18, 1909. When the comptroller overruled the auditor of the District of Columbia he was compelled, in order to do so, not to mention in his ruling the very point upon which the auditor has based his decision. In order that this matter may go into the RECORD, I wish to embody Mr. Tracewell's ruling as a part of my remarks. The law is that the municipal architect shall do the work himself, and, notwithstanding that law, these enormous fees have been paid outside.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman if these buildings were not contracted for before the law became effective imposing the duty on the municipal architect?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have not gone into that matter closely, but there is a letter from the auditor to the District Commissioners saying that it was against the law for him to pay these amounts, and he declined to pay them.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

The following are the papers referred to by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky:

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, August 9, 1909.

The honorable the COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

GENTLEMEN: Under date of August 4, 1909, the commissioners issued the following order:

"That contract be entered into between the District of Columbia and the following-named persons, to assist the municipal architect in the preparation of plans and specifications for the school buildings and other buildings hereinafter mentioned, at the compensation and within the time limitation stated in each case respectively, upon the following conditions, namely:

"First. That the plans and specifications shall be prepared and delivered to the municipal architect within the time limited in each case, respectively.

"Second. That the plans and specifications so prepared shall be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

"Third. That in the event a bona fide proposal can not be obtained by said commissioners to construct a building upon the plans and specifications so prepared, within the amount of money available for each building, respectively, the person or persons who prepared same shall so modify said plans and specifications, without further compensation, as to enable a proposal to be obtained within the amount of money available for each building, respectively.

"Fourth. That the above conditions shall be accepted in writing by the persons named before this contract shall be in effect.

"With Paul J. Pelz for plans and specifications for the eight-room school building to take the place of the old Potomac School building, at a compensation of $2,000 for plans, specifications, and necessary details; to be completed within three months from the date of this order.

"With Appleton P. Clark, jr., plans and specifications for the eight-room school building at Cleveland Park, at a compensation of $2,000 for plans, specifications, and necessary details; to be completed within three months from the date of this order.

"With Thomas W. Power for plans and specifications for the public-convenience station at Ninth and F Streets NW., at a compensation of $700 for the plans, specifications, and necessary details; to be completed within two months from the date of this order.

"With L. E. Dessez for plans and specifications for the engine house to take the place of No. 2, at a compensation of $1,200 for plans, specifications, and necessary details; to be completed within three months from date of this order.

"With Averill, Hall & Adams for plans and specifications for the engine house near Minnesota and Pennsylvania Avenues, at a compensation of $770 for plans, specifications, and necessary details; to be completed within three months from the date of this order.

"With H. J. Rush Marshall for plans and specifications for annex or extension of McKinley Manual Training School, at a compensation of $3,150 for plans, specifications, and necessary details; to be completed in time to begin construction next spring, not later than April 1, 1910."

This order is based on the recommendation of the municipal architect dated July 27, 1909. The municipal architect states that there are 16 buildings provided for in the 1910 District appropriation act—11 new buildings and 5 additions or enlargements. The municipal architect further states giving the work to outside architects would be the most expeditious method of securing the completion of the plans and specifications for the reason that, if all the plans had to be made in the office of the municipal architect, it would take about 32 months with the present force of 4 draftsmen, and it would require 22 draftsmen to complete the plans for the 16 buildings in 6 months. He further states that it would not be advisable for the District to employ 22 men for a period of 6 months and discharge them after their work had been completed, as by this method the District would not be able to secure the services of good experienced draftsmen without paying very high rates, and with the strong probability that the employment of that number of draftsmen in the office of the municipal architect would impose such a drain on the employment of per diem services authorized by section 2 of the District appropriation act as to seriously jeopardize the administrative work of the several branches of the engineer department, which secures the employment of per diem services under the said section.

The office of municipal architect was created by the 1910 District appropriation act in the following language:

"* * * Municipal architect, whose duty it shall be to prepare and supervise plans for, and superintend the construction of all municipal buildings, and the repair and improvement of all buildings belonging to the District of Columbia under the direction of the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, $3,600; and all laws or parts of laws placing such duties upon the inspector of buildings of the District of Columbia are hereby repealed." (35 Stat., 692.)

Further reference is made to the municipal architect in the 1910 District appropriation act under the head of public schools:

"That the plans and specifications for all buildings provided for in this act shall be prepared under the supervision of the municipal architect and shall be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and shall be constructed in conformity therewith." (35 Stat., 709.)

Prior to the creation of the office of municipal architect the law provided as follows:

"That the plans and specifications for school buildings shall be prepared under the supervision of the inspector of buildings of the District of Columbia and shall be approved by the Commissioners of the District, and shall be constructed by the commissioners in conformity therewith; and the plans and specifications for all other buildings provided for in this act shall be prepared under the supervision of the inspector of buildings of the District of Columbia, and shall be approved by the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and the Commissioners of the District and shall be constructed in conformity therewith." (35 Stat., 295.)

It will be observed that this provision of law did not specifically impose on the inspector of buildings, as is the case with the municipal architect, the duty of preparing plans for District buildings. Congress undoubtedly recognized that to add this very important feature of municipal administration to an office already charged by law with very large and important responsibilities would not produce the best results and would hinder, rather than advance, the expeditious handling of the work. This, it appeals to me, was the reason why the inspector of buildings, under the provision quoted, was only charged with having the plans and specifications prepared under his supervision, and not with the actual preparation of the plans and specifications.

The language of this provision is practically the same as that which appears under the head of public schools in the District appropriation act for the fiscal year 1910, in reference to the municipal architect. But the law creating the office of municipal architect expressly and in terms declares that it shall be the duty of the municipal architect to prepare and supervise the plans for and superintend the construction of all municipal buildings, and the repair and improvement of all buildings belonging to the District of Columbia under the direction of the Engineer Commissioner of the District.

In submitting to Congress the necessity for the creation of the position of municipal architect of the District of Columbia, the commissioners recommended that the duties of the proposed officer should be prescribed as follows:

"Municipal architect, whose duty it shall be to supervise the preparation of plans for and the construction of all municipal buildings, and the repair and improvement of all buildings belonging to the District of Columbia, under the direction of the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia; and all laws or parts of laws placing such duties upon the inspector of buildings of the District of Columbia are hereby repealed." (Estimates of Appropriations, 1910, p. 504.)

The duties recommended by the commissioners for the municipal architect were substantially those which were imposed by law upon the inspector of buildings. Congress, however, in creating the office, did not adopt verbatim the language of the law proposed by the commissioners, as will be seen by a comparison of the recommendation of the commissioners with the law of Congress creating the position of municipal architect. As illustrating the views of the engineer commissioner of the District and the views of the Subcommittee on District Appropriations of the House of Representatives, as those views appear of record in the printed hearings on the District of Columbia appropriation bill for 1910, pages 19 et seq., the following is here quoted:

"MUNICIPAL ARCHITECT.

"Mr. BOWERS. Here is some legislation—

"Municipal architect, whose duty it shall be to supervise the preparation of plans for and the construction of all municipal buildings and the repair and improvement of all buildings belonging to the District of Columbia under the direction of the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia, $3,600; and all laws or parts of laws placing such duties upon the inspector of buildings of the District of Columbia are hereby repealed.

"Maj. MORROW. That we went into last year, and it is explained in the notes.

"Mr. BURLESON. We did not allow it last year?

"Mr. BOWERS. No; evidently not; otherwise it would not be here now.

"Mr. VREELAND. Don't you think you can get a greater diversity by getting different architects to prepare designs for the school buildings?

"Maj. MORROW. We do not intend that this man shall do all the architectural work of the District. He will probably design half of the school buildings. Probably a quarter of the school buildings are now designed in the office of the inspector of buildings. He will simply employ architects and supervise their work.

"Mr. VREELAND. Who does this work now?

"Maj. MORROW. The inspector of buildings this year, and we employ several architects under him.

"Mr. MADDEN. What percentage do you pay the architects?

"Maj. MORROW. They are paid according to the architect's schedules; 2½ per cent and 3½ per cent.

"Mr. MADDEN. Two and one-half per cent where they do not superintend?

"Maj. MORROW. Two and one-half per cent where they work up a given plan. Three and one-half per cent when they furnish the plan and designs; it would be 5 per cent when they do the work of designing and supervising the construction.

"Mr. GARDNER. Does the inspector get anything additional where he furnishes the plans?

"Maj. MORROW. No, sir; not a cent.

"Mr. GARDNER. There are no perquisites of that kind?

"Maj. MORROW. No, sir.

"Mr. MACFARLAND. I believe that the inspector of buildings ought to be relieved of the work which a municipal architect ought to do, and that it would improve the service greatly.

"Mr. GARDNER. He is substantially relieved if he has only the plans for two buildings.

"Maj. MORROW. Not at all, Mr. Chairman. You do not understand that very clearly. For instance, one day last week the inspector of buildings and myself spent an hour or more in the office of Marsh & Peter, architects, to go over the plans of a new 12-room building to relieve the Thompson School, now about to be advertised. He had the supervision of those plans, although the architect is preparing them. In the office we went over those tracings and made numerous pencil notes on those tracings. That took one hour and a half of his time out of that day in the supervision of the plans prepared by this architect, the architect being paid 3½ per cent for the work that he does on the plans, work which is largely done by the employees of that office who have to prepare those plans. They are not in the office of the inspector of buildings. That same things happens with all other school buildings that are designed outside, and that was only one of a number of visits he has had to make to that office. At the same time, the municipal architect would not have so much of the other work to do but that he could take care of a few more buildings in his own office.

"Mr. MADDEN. Is every contractor who is about to erect a building required to submit his plans to the inspector of buildings for his approval before he begins construction?

"Maj. MORROW. Yes, sir.

"Mr. MADDEN. Who looks after the sanitary provisions in the plans before the permit is issued?

"Maj. MORROW. The inspector of buildings and the inspector of plumbing. All the plumbing arrangements are looked over by the inspector of plumbing before the permit is issued, and all the details are worked over by the computers to see if the walls are of the right thickness and that the floors have the proper strength, and so on.

"Mr. MADDEN. Is the inspector of buildings an engineer?

"Maj. MORROW. Yes.

"Mr. MADDEN. He knows how to figure on the strength?

"Maj. MORROW. Yes, sir; and he has two computers in his office who do but little else.

"Mr. MADDEN. Is he required to be an engineer?

"Maj. MORROW. The present inspector of buildings is a graduate of Lafayette College.

"Mr. MACFARLAND. The board of education has recommended that there shall be a school architect at $3,000 a year under the board of education, and the commissioners have recommended that all that work shall be done by the municipal architect, together with all other municipal buildings, at a salary of $3,600.

"Mr. GARDNER. One man, you think, ought to be able to take care of it all?

"Mr. MACFARLAND. Without doubt."

Congress has prohibited the employment of personal services by the government of the District of Columbia, except where authority is specifically granted the commissioners by law for such employment. In the District appropriation act for the fiscal year 1906, section 2, is found the following prohibitory legislation:

"That no civil officer, clerk, draftsman, copyist, messenger, assistant messenger, mechanic, watchman, labor, or other employee shall, after June 30, 1905, be employed in any office, department, or branch of the government of the District of Columbia except annually at such rates and in such numbers, respectively, as may be specifically appropriated for by Congress for such clerical and other personal service for each fiscal year; and no civil officer, draftsman, copyist, messenger, assistant messenger, mechanic, watchman, laborer, or other employee shall after said date be employed in any office, department, or other branch of the government of the District of Columbia or be paid from any appropriation made for contingent expenses or for any specific or general purpose unless such employment is authorized and payment therefor specifically provided in the law granting the appropriation or authorized as hereinafter provided, and then only for services actually rendered in connection with and for the purposes of the appropriation from which payment is made and at the rate or compensation usual and proper for such services." (33 Stat., 913.)

By reference to the 1910 District appropriation act it will be found that Congress has provided for the several offices and departments of the District government positions and offices carrying annual compensations. In addition to the offices carrying annual compensations, Congress has authorized the commissioners to employ certain temporary per diem services within a given amount. This authority for the current fiscal year is contained in section 2 of the District appropriation act for the fiscal year 1910, which reads as follows:

"The services of draftsmen, assistant engineers, levelers, transmen, rodmen, chainmen, computers, copyists, overseers, and inspectors temporarily required in connection with sewer, street, or road work, or the construction and repair of buildings and bridges, or any general or special engineering or construction work authorized by appropriations may be employed exclusively to carry into effect said appropriations when specifically and in writing ordered by the Commissioners of the District; and all such necessary expenditures for the proper execution of said work shall be paid from and equitably charged against the sums appropriated for said work; and the Commissioners of the District in their annual estimates shall report the number of such employees performing such services and their work and the sums paid to each and out of what appropriation: Provided, That the expenditures hereunder shall not exceed $62,000 during the fiscal year 1910." (35 Stat., 310.)

It will be seen that this section authorizes the employment of draftsmen and other necessary clerical services in connection with the construction and repair of buildings, and does not authorize the employment of personal services of architects designated as such. I am in very grave doubt whether the commissioners have the authority under the law to enter into contracts with architects for the preparation of plans and specifications for school buildings, as indicated in their order of August 4, 1909, supra. It appeals to me that in creating the office of municipal architect and in terms providing that that officer shall prepare and supervise all plans that Congress meant, taking into consideration the several laws herein quoted, that such plans were to be prepared in the office of the municipal architect and under his supervision, and, if necessary, through the employment of temporary per diem services of the character mentioned in section 2 of the District appropriation act for the fiscal year 1910, above quoted.

In view of the grave doubt as to the authority of the commissioners to enter into contracts with the architects mentioned in their order of August 4, 1909, supra, I have the honor to recommend that the questions be submitted to the Comptroller of the Treasury for his decision—

1. Whether under the law the commissioners can legally make such contracts; or

2. Whether in the preparation of plans and specifications for school buildings and other municipal buildings such plans and specifications shall be prepared in the office of the municipal architect; and

3. If additional services be necessary, whether such services must not be employed under section 2 of the District appropriation act for the fiscal year 1910, supra.

Very respectfuly,

A. TWEEDALE,
Auditor District of Columbia.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 18, 1909.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS
OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

SIR: I am in receipt, by your reference of the 13th instant, of a letter from the Auditor for the District of Columbia, wherein the general question is raised whether your board is authorized to let contracts to outside architects for the preparation of plans and specifications for the erection of certain school and other municipal buildings in the District of Columbia, namely: For one eight-room school building, to take the place of the old Potomac School building; for an eight-room school building at Cleveland Park; for annex or extension of McKinley Manual Training School; for a public-convenience station at Ninth and F Streets NW.; for an engine house, to take the place of No. 2; for an engine house near Minnesota and Pennsylvania Avenues. It is stated also in the auditor's letter that the District appropriation bill for the current fiscal year contains provision for 16 municipal buildings—11 new buildings and 5 additions or enlargements; that there are at present 4 draftsmen in the employ of the District and at the command of the municipal architect; that it will require the services of 22 draftsmen for a period of 6 months to make the plans for these 16 buildings; and that such a drain would jeopardize the other services contemplated by section 2 of said appropriation act, which provides for the employment of draftsmen, assistant engineers, levelers, transitmen, rodmen, chainmen, computers, copyists, overseers, and inspectors temporarily required in connection with sewer, street, or road work, or the construction and repair of buildings and bridges, or any general or special engineering or construction work authorized by appropriations, and to be exclusively employed to carry into effect such appropriations when specifically and in writing ordered by the Commissioners of the District; and that all such expenditures shall be paid from and equitably charged against the sums appropriated for said works, provided that the expenditures for said purposes shall not exceed $62,000 for the current fiscal year.

Prior to the present fiscal year the law made no provision for a municipal architect for the District of Columbia.

The architectural work of the District was provided for in 35 Statutes at Large, page 205, as follows:

"That the plans and specifications for school buildings shall be prepared under the supervision of the inspector of buildings of the District of Columbia and shall be approved by the Commissioners of the District, and shall be constructed by the commissioners in conformity therewith; and the plans and specifications for all other buildings provided for in this act shall be prepared under the supervision of the inspector of buildings of the District of Columbia, and shall be approved by the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and the Commissioners of the District, and shall be constructed in conformity therewith."

As the necessary consequence of this legislation outside architects were employed and paid from the several building appropriations. It would appear from the above act that all the architectural work of the District was to be prepared under the supervision of the inspector of buildings of the District of Columbia, and the plans for school buildings were to be approved by the Commissioners of the District. The plans and specifications for all other municipal buildings, except school buildings, were to be approved jointly by the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and the District Commissioners.

The District appropriation act for the current fiscal year (35 Stat. L., p. 692) first created the office of municipal architect for the District of Columbia in the following language, and prescribed his duties as follows:

"* * * municipal architect, whose duty it shall be to prepare and supervise plans for, and superintend the construction of, all municipal buildings, and the repair and improvement of all buildings belonging to the District of Columbia, under the direction of the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, $3,600. And all laws or parts of laws placing such duties upon the inspector of buildings of the District of Columbia are hereby repealed."

Further along in said act, page 709, we find the following clause:

"That the plans and specifications for all buildings provided for in this act shall be prepared under the supervision of the municipal architect and shall be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and shall be constructed in conformity therewith."

There is apparently a conflict between these clauses as to the duties of the municipal architect. From their casual reading it would appear that it was the duty of this officer, as prescribed in the clause creating his office, to prepare the plans and specifications for all the municipal buildings of the District. But when read more carefully it is apparent that Congress even in this clause had in mind that there was some municipal buildings that he was to supervise their plans and specifications only, and not prepare them. The language is "whose duty it shall be to prepare and supervise plans for." * * * Where he is required by law to prepare plans and specifications for a building, it would be little less than nonsensical for Congress to command him to supervise his own preparations.

Bringing to our aid a few well-understood rules of statutory construction the apparent conflict between these two clauses of the act disappear.

1. It is presumed that all legislation is enacted to accomplish the result sought.

2. That each and every word in a law is to be given its plain and ordinary meaning, unless it has a technical one different from the ordinary meaning.

3. That a law general in its character must give way to a law special in its nature on the same subject.

The results sought in the enactments contained in the laws providing for the erection of municipal buildings in the District of Columbia, and about which you inquire, is the erection of these buildings in a reasonable time from the date of the availability of the appropriations therefor. One of the necessary and preliminary incidents to the accomplishment of these results is the preparation of plans and specifications for these buildings. The clause creating the office of municipal architect and defining its duties is general in character and apparently covers all municipal buildings. The second clause is special, and defines his duties as to the particular municipal buildings provided for in the appropriation act for the present fiscal year.

It is not made his duty in the latter clause to prepare plans and specifications for these particular buildings, but on the contrary to supervise these plans. This clause has the same legal effect as if it were a proviso to the clause wherein he is directed to prepare all plans and specifications for all municipal buildings. It also serves to explain why Congress used the words "supervise plans" in the first clause.

I am therefore of the opinion that you are authorized to contract with outside architects for the plans and specifications of all municipal buildings provided for in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the present fiscal year, and that it is the duty of the municipal architect to prepare the plans and specifications for all other municipal buildings, and to superintend the construction of all municipal buildings, including the buildings provided for in the current District appropriation act, under the direction of the engineer commissioner of the District.

The second and third questions submitted are:

"2. Whether in the preparation of plans and specifications for school buildings, and other municipal buildings, such plans and specifications shall be prepared in the office of the municipal architect; and

"3. If additional services be necessary, whether such services must be employed under section 2 of the District appropriation act for the fiscal year 1910, supra."

The second question is fully answered above.

Any temporary additional draftsmen, computers, copyists, etc., needed by the municipal architect to enable him to prepare plans and specifications for municipal buildings, or to properly supervise plans prepared by outside architects, must be furnished him under the conditions and limitations of section 2 of the District of Columbia appropriation act for the present fiscal year, above referred to in this decision.

Respectfully,

R. J. TRACEWELL, Comptroller.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman the reason for creating the new office on page 11, line 2.

Mr. BURLESON. The skilled machinist?

Mr. FOWLER. He is designated as a machinist.

Mr. BURLESON. The Commissioners of the District, acting upon the recommendation of the municipal architect, reached the conclusion that the additional officer was needed in connection with repair work on certain engines and boilers and other machinery that is used in the District service, and also in connection with certain service to be rendered in the schools. They say that there are several steam and gas engines for running the fans and electric motors, which are in constant need of repair. They were satisfied that it would be more economical to employ regularly a machinist for this purpose than to give sporadic employment to other concerns for the repairs.

Mr. FOWLER. The bill provides for a boss carpenter, a boss tinner, a boss plumber, a boss steam fitter, and boss grader.

Mr. BURLESON. All of whom are kept busy in the discharge of their official duties. The commissioners reached the conclusion that this additional man was necessary. I have before me the note, which is as follows:

The service of a skilled machinist is badly needed in connection with the repair shop, for the reason that there are in the various school buildings 46 gas engines, used for running the fans, and 7 electric motors, used for the same purpose. There are also several steam engines which are constantly in need of repairs of such a nature as to require the services of a skilled machinist. They comprise the boring out of gas-engine cylinders, making piston rings, piston rods, etc. Heretofore it has been necessary to send these parts to some local machine shop for repair, and in doing so great delays have been experienced and in many cases exorbitant charges have been made on account of the work being done as an emergency job. As we have at present an up-to-date machine shop, equipped with lathes, shaper, power drills, etc., which have been collected and installed by the superintendent of repairs, with the aid of a machinist, from equipment discarded by the school officials as unfit for further use, work can be turned out at a great saving to the District, and can be done in a more satisfactory manner than if it were sent out to outside concerns.

Mr. FOWLER. I was going to ask, after enumerating the various bosses, if any of the duties provided for this new officer were not now performed by any of these various bosses?

Mr. BURLESON. No; the repairs that have been necessary have been sent to various machinists, local machine shops, for repair, and in doing so many of the charges were exorbitant by reason of their being emergency jobs. As I have stated, the committee believed it would be more economical to employ a regular skilled machinist.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it intended to send him to the various parts of the city for the purpose of looking after these machines?

Mr. BURLESON. He is to repair and supervise the repair of these various machines.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 3, at the end of the line, add the following: "Provided, That no money herein appropriated shall be paid to architects outside of the municipal architect's office for any public building in the District of Columbia."

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment in its present form. The current law expressly provides for the employment of architects outside of the municipal architect's office, and I do not think the gentleman himself would desire to have this change that law.

Mr. COX. I understand that the present law requires all the plans and specifications to be prepared by the architect's office.

Mr. MANN. That is what I supposed the gentleman thought. Last year there was more or less contest in reference to the high school buildings. There was an appropriation for the purchase of land for the high school buildings. A bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia providing that the surplus funds not expended might be used in the preparation of plans. That bill was never passed; but when the appropriation bill passed it provided the same thing, and provided, as I recall it, expressly, that outside architects might be employed. I do not think anyone wishes to change that provision, because that has already been done.

Mr. COX. What law was that in?

Mr. MANN. In the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I will say that since the adoption of this general law there have been two or three instances in the making of appropriations where that law has been overlooked by Congress, and a special provision inserted in the few instances to which I have referred, for the employment of an outside architect; but I do insist that in the list which I just sent to the Clerk's desk as a part of my remarks, from which I read, there is item after item paid out by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for services of outside architects, notwithstanding the item which I now have before me prohibiting it, and which reads as follows:

Municipal architect's office: Municipal architect, whose duty hereafter it shall be to prepare or supervise the preparation of plans for, and superintend the construction of, all municipal buildings, and the repair and improvement of all buildings belonging to the District of Columbia, and serve under the direction of the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia, $3,600.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist upon his point of order?

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, it is a change of existing law.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman from Indiana desires his amendment to go in in the shape in which it is.

Mr. COX. It may not be perfect.

Mr. MANN. The provision in reference to the Central High School building last year was—that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to use so much as may be necessary of any unexpended balances remaining in the appropriations for the purchase of a site for a new Central High School and for the purchase of a site for a new M Street High School, contained in the District appropriation act for the fiscal year 1912, approved March 2, 1911, for the employment of architectural services in the preparation of plans and specifications for said high schools and for such other personal services and expenses in connection therewith as may be necessary.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman contend that is a general law?

Mr. MANN. Certainly it is a general law as to these schools, and that is all.

Mr. COX. Does it apply to all of the public-school buildings here?

Mr. MANN. No; only to those two school buildings.

Mr. COX. Then it is not a universal law. It is not an organic act that shall apply to every public building.

Mr. MANN. Certainly not.

Mr. COX. Then, Mr. Chairman, I contend that my amendment is solely a limitation, and is clearly within the rules of the House.

Mr. BURLESON. The Chair will understand there is an appropriation carried in this bill for the Central High School building and the M Street High School building, and to that extent it would be a change of the law referred to by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, of course I do not know just what the gentleman's amendment covers in the way it is offered. It is offered as an amendment to a paragraph containing certain salaries, no portion of which could be used for the employment of outside architects at all. If the gentleman's amendment is only a limitation upon that paragraph, of course it would be in order, but useless.

The CHAIRMAN. The language of this is—

Provided, That no money herein appropriated shall be paid to architects outside of the municipal architect's office for any public building in the District of Columbia——

Mr. MANN. The usual provision is, that no money appropriated by this paragraph or section, or no money appropriated by this act. That does not say either one. I do not know how the comptroller or the Chair might construe that.

Mr. COX. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to submit this observation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order. I believe it is a pure limitation, whatever it may mean.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I renew the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear from the gentleman from Indiana on his point of order.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I want to submit this observation. While my amendment was hastily drawn and may not be properly and correctly worded, I believe it ought to pass, in view of the facts that have been recently disclosed here by the gentleman from Kentucky. There is a frightful condition of affairs here, and I will lead up to the point in a moment. Here we are appropriating to maintain a great architect's office in the District of Columbia, the sum total of the appropriation being $26,250 a year to maintain the salaries in that office, and yet, Mr. Chairman, under the figures disclosed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], the District of Columbia in some way or manner has paid out $67,000 to outside architects to prepare plans and specifications, I presume, for public buildings here in the District of Columbia. Now, if my amendment is a limitation upon the appropriation for this bureau, which I insist it is, then I insist, Mr. Chairman, it is clearly in order under the Holman rule, as it certainly tends to reduce expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule in regard to limitations upon an appropriation is pretty liberal and there can be a limitation, as the gentleman from Texas understands, that does change existing law under the existing rules——

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, of course I am not familiar with the facts stated in the communication read by the gentleman from Kentucky, but as was said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], last year there was a specific authorization to employ outside architects in the preparation of the plans for the M Street High School and the new Central High School. I have not had an opportunity to examine this amendment, but I would not want anything to go into this bill that might interfere with the carrying out of the express purpose of Congress in that particular. I am inclined to think that probably as it reads it may be a limitation, but I will ask that the amendment be voted down, because it can serve no good purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the point of order?

Mr. BURLESON. I withdraw the point of order and ask that the amendment be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. Cox) there were—ayes 7, noes 20.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN (after counting). Thirteen gentlemen demand tellers; not a sufficient number.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-three gentlemen are present—not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Ames	Byrnes, S. C.	Davidson	Floyd, Ark.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, and he reported the list of the absentees.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and twenty-nine Members have responded to the call—a quorum.

AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION BILL.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the Lever agricultural extension bill, H. R. 22871, an act to establish agricultural extension departments in connection with agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, with Senate amendments, is on the Speaker's table. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] is absent temporarily, and at his suggestion I ask unanimous consent that there be a print of the bill with Senate amendments made, and that it remain on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent for a print of the bill H. R. 22871, the agricultural extension bill, with Senate amendments, and that the bill shall remain on the table. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACKMON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I did not quite catch the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman wants the bill to be printed with Senate amendments, and asks that it remain on the table so that the Members can find out what is in the Senate amendments. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LATE REPRESENTATIVE M'HENRY.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for present consideration of the following order, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Sunday, the 16th of February, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. JOHN G. MCHENRY, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to considering this order now? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on agreeing to the order.

The question was taken, and the order was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that both of these requests, the one on the part of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the one on the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROTHERMEL] are out of order, and are not to be taken as a precedent as to other business having a right to go in between a committee rising on a call and resuming its sitting.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT). The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

Mr. BURLESON. Inasmuch as the House is now full, I think probably there ought to be some explanation or short statement in order that the Members may know exactly what they are voting upon.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment was pending on which the House was dividing, when the point of no quorum was made, which precipitated this roll call.

Mr. BURLESON. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again reported, and I move that I may have five minutes in which to explain the situation, and that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Page 11, at the end of line 3, insert:

"Provided, That no money herein appropriated shall be paid to architects outside of the municipal architect's office for any public buildings in the District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] asks unanimous consent that he may address the committee for five minutes, and that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] may address the committee for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in explanation of the amendment I desire to say to the House that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was acting with a very few members present. With that small attendance I read a statement furnished by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, at my request, to the effect that notwithstanding the fact that there is a law which directs the municipal architect and his force to prepare all the plans and specifications for all buildings erected by the District of Columbia—notwithstanding that mandatory law—the commissioners have recently paid out the sum of more than $67,000 to outside architects. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] has offered an amendment of limitation to the bill, providing that there shall be in substance no outside architect's fees paid under the provision of this bill.

That is the substance of the question that is now before the House. I think that a simple, plain statement of it is just as good as a longer presentation of it would be, and just as good as any elaborate argument would be. The law is mandatory, I repeat, that there be no fees paid to outside architects. But notwithstanding that fact, the commissioners have paid these outside architects' fees to the extent of more than $67,000.

It may be well, however, for me to state that the $67,000 is not made up entirely of fees paid out in direct violation of the law, for the reason that two or three appropriations have carried with them the right to employ outside architects. But it leaves the fact still remaining that the commissioners, notwithstanding the law, do employ outside architects. It is believed that if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] is adopted it can not be done out of any appropriation that is made in this bill.

Mr. BURLESON. Responding to the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] that there is no authorization of law for the employment of architects in the preparation of plans within the District of Columbia, it is only necessary for me to read you the law. The law reads as follows:

Municipal architect, whose duty hereafter it shall be to prepare or supervise the preparation of plans for, and superintend the construction of, all municipal buildings, and the repair and improvement of all buildings belonging to the District of Columbia.

Under that law there has been no concealment of the practice of the District authorities. The statement was made in last year's hearings by the Engineer commissioner, in clean-cut terms, showing just exactly what was being done, and I will read it to the committee:

Maj. JUDSON. As to the municipal architect's office, I would say that no increase in that office is essential, but it seems to be advisable because we are still, as Congress has been informed from year to year, obliged to give some portion of our work out to architects. The force is not enough to design all of the buildings that are provided for. Most of the changes are directed toward the end of permitting a greater number of the buildings to be designed in the municipal architect's office.

I asked him, then, this question:

Mr. BURLESON. What percentage of them would be prepared in the municipal architect's office if these increases were granted?

Maj. JUDSON. That is a little hard to say, because I do not know just what the appropriations will be for buildings next year or the character of them.

Mr. BURLESON. Can you tell me the percentage of buildings the designs for which were prepared by the municipal architect's office last year?

Maj. JUDSON. I will insert that information in the record.

Mr. SAUNDERS. In proportion to those prepared on the outside?

Maj. JUDSON. I will insert that in the record. I know it is true that the municipal architect's work was done at considerably less cost than the work that was put out. So it was a very good thing to have as many as possible designed in his office. The total cost of planning and inspecting construction was 3.38 per cent of the cost of the buildings. It would have been 6 per cent if outside architects had done it all, and 5.04 per cent if the architects had made all of the plans. The cost of inspection by the municipal architect's office was 1.54 per cent, and the cost of preparation of plans by that office was less than 1 per cent. Outside architects receive 3½ per cent for plans alone. Sixty-two and one-half per cent of the work was done in the office of the municipal architect, and 37½ per cent of the work was done by private architects in 1911 (fiscal year).

Now, gentlemen, under the limitation proposed and discussed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] it would be impossible to secure the assistance of outside architects in the preparation of plans for these buildings. Every man here knows that it is utterly impossible for the municipal architect's force, costing only $26,250, many of the employees of this office being employed in repair work and supervision work, to prepare all the plans for all the buildings that are being authorized by the Congress for municipal purposes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman know that that is the same and the identical argument that is used by the architects in the Treasury Department, but that notwithstanding that argument, Congress repealed what is known as the Tarsney Act, which gave to the outside architects a tremendous amount of work?

Mr. BURLESON. That may be; but as I have shown you, in 67½ per cent of the work the service is rendered by the municipal architect's office at less than the cost of the outside service, and the commissioners, in order that the municipal architect could do a larger portion of this work, have asked for a larger force and yet have stated from year to year that the municipal architect's office can not do all of this work. It has not been the policy here to have all the buildings modeled after the same plan, and in last year's bill we authorized the employment of an unexpended balance for payment to Mr. Ittner, in order that we might secure his services in the preparation of plans for the new Central High School Building, which is to cost $1,000,000.

I do not want to see that amendment go on, because it would interfere with the interests of the public service, and it would interfere with that architect going on with this work in the preparation of the plans for the new Central High School Building.

And it is for these reasons that we ask the committee to vote down the amendment that has been offered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have some time left.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has two minutes remaining.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the argument made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] could not be more forcibly stated than he has stated it as a reason why this amendment should pass.

Mr. BURLESON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BURLESON. I have no desire to shut off the gentleman from speaking, but he did not reserve the remainder of his time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I was given five minutes without any reservation.

Mr. BURLESON. I should like to know how much time he consumed originally.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The fact remains that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are violating the law. Where they get the money to pay this $67,000 to outside architects I do not know, but they pay it, and they pay it over the protest of their own auditor. They pay it against the written opinion of their own auditor that they have no right to pay it.

Mr. BURLESON. But Mr. Tracewell, the supreme authority, overruled him.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They appealed it to Mr. Tracewell, Comptroller of the Treasury, and I have just filed his written opinion, in which, in order to agree with the commissioners, he is compelled not to mention the main question, but he writes all around it. He ignores absolutely the good argument put up by the auditor for the District of Columbia, and simply does not controvert it or mention it otherwise.

The chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], has just read to you the permanent law, which provides that they shall not go on the outside for architects. Yet they have gone on the outside for them. This amendment, if it does no other good, will emphasize the fact that they are going beyond their authority, and that Congress does not intend to stand for their violation of the law. They even go into a hearing admitting their violation of it, and a Member of this House comes here and practically boasts of their defiance of the law. [Applause.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out he last word. I confess that I am not familiar with the statute that has been referred to by the gentleman in charge of the bill and by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, but I hope that if the law does not now permit, it will be so amended that in the future it will permit the employment of high-class architects outside of the municipal architect's office. It may be a little bit cheaper—although of that I am not convinced—to employ an architect on a salary to design buildings who will get up stock designs and put up a building here and a building there and a building in some other place, all alike. Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, if we were controlled by the argument of the gentleman we would be influenced to adopt Mr. Edison's plan of poured concrete houses on models that we could go into the market and buy.

Now, my information with reference to the operations of the Tarsney Act is that it did not entail any additional expense upon the Government of the United States.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman will permit me, the proof before my committee last summer showed it to be a fact that it increases the total cost about 2 per cent.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Possibly I was misinformed. I do not know. I said I had been informed. I have not read the evidence as carefully as the gentleman has.

Mr. COX. And I will state to the gentleman that that is J. Knox Taylor's own statement.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. J. Knox Taylor was interested in having that work confined to his office. I do not mean to insinuate that he would not tell the truth about it, for I believe he would; but every man is more or less influenced in his judgment by the interest of his office or his organization, and he was ambitious to do all that work. Now, I believe we will get materially better buildings by consulting outside architects. I have just been assured that we will get materially better buildings and better-looking buildings and a style of architecture that will more commend us and our taste to future generations, and without materially increasing the cost, by securing the additional services of outside architects.

Mr. COX. The Tarsney Act has been repealed.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; and I think it was a mistake. I voted against its repeal.

Mr. COX. I voted for it.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The committee opposes the amendment because it does not regard the same as good legislation. Such an amendment in its possible effect might interfere with a provision of the bill adopted last year. Another reason for objecting to this amendment is that the same principle which might render it altogether proper that all the work done in Capt. Taylor's office should be done by the employees of that office, does not apply in this case.

Many of the Government buildings are of a uniform character; the architect's office can use, and does use the plans of one building for another building. The question of architectural beauty does not in many instances enter into the preparation of the plans necessary to be prepared in Capt. Taylor's office.

But in Washington, with respect to a number of buildings that are to be constructed, having regard to the general character of the architecture in other public buildings, having further regard to the general beautification of the public buildings in Washington, in its proper development by a succession of stately buildings for public use, it is absolutely necessary that authority should be given to call upon, and employ on certain occasions, the services of outside architects.

It is no reflection upon the architect's department that this is necessary to be done. Every State has an attorney general, and yet it is frequently true in all the States that special assistants are provided for the attorney general in respect of some cases of peculiar difficulty. Every county has its prosecuting officer, but frequently it is necessary to go beyond the county and secure special counsel to aid in the conduct of some prosecution of an unusual character. To put such a limitation as this into the bill would hinder the District from securing the assistance of architects required for special work. This amendment is not good legislation.

So far as the ruling referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], is concerned, I call attention to the fact that one of the documents filed, contains a reversal of the ruling of the auditor. I do not wish to enter at all into the merits of either ruling. It is unnecessary to do so. But the fact remains that the ruling of the auditor was overruled by Mr. Tracewell to whom the appeal was taken. It is perfectly competent for this body, if it chooses, so to do, to put this limitation on the architect's office of the District. It is up to the committee.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia. I crave the indulgence of the committee for only a few moments. Incidentally the Tarsney Act became involved in this discussion. I presume there are Members of the House who have read the correspondence between Mr. Burnham, the then acknowledged peer of the architects in this country, and the great John G. Carlisle, of Kentucky, who at that time was Secretary of the Treasury. The outside architects were not employed, notwithstanding the statute looked him squarely in the face which gave him the right to employ outside architects. Mr. Carlisle, in his rugged honesty, refused to employ them, and Mr. Burnham took him to task for it. The result was that all through Mr. Carlisle's term of office the Tarsney Act was not put into effect.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, Mr. Carlisle named the architect of that monstrosity known as the Chicago post office.

Mr. COX. It may be that the architecture of that building gave to the city of Chicago a building suitable to the city of Chicago. I do not know anything about that. But, Mr. Chairman, the proof is easily within the reach of every Member of this House that, by reason of the Tarsney Act increasing the cost of public buildings in this country 2 per cent, Congress in its wisdom and candid judgment repealed the Tarsney Act. J. Knox Taylor, in my judgment a splendid architect, said that he had no doubt that his office was perfectly capable of handling all buildings up to $2,000,000. I am not in favor of creating architecture bureaus and then going outside of them and employing outside architects. If they are not competent, they have no business to be in office. If they are not competent to design and superintend the construction of public buildings, my judgment is that they had better get out of office in the District of Columbia and get some one else that is.

Mr. BURLESON. But the office has not the force.

Mr. COX. I stand ready at any moment to vote for enough money in this bill that will make the architect's office in the District of Columbia of sufficient size and force to do all the work necessary to be done.

Mr. BURLESON. But points of order will be made against those provisions.

Mr. COX. It is up to this House to settle this one question, in my judgment, Does this House propose, in the first place, to vote this amendment in?

If it proposes to stand for economy, it will vote for it. Of that, I have not the shadow of a doubt. But their idea that they say they have to go outside to get outside architects to me is preposterous; I do not believe one word of it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Is it not a fact that the Supervising Architect's Office of the Treasury Department is now two years behind with plans and specifications for public buildings already authorized by Congress?

Mr. COX. That has nothing on earth to do with this question. They were behind long before Congress repealed the Tarsney Act.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman stated that while John G. Carlisle was Secretary of the Treasury no outside architects were appointed.

Mr. COX. Under the Tarsney Act.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know who was the Supervising Architect of the Treasury under Mr. Carlisle?

Mr. COX. No.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know who drew the plans for the Chicago Federal Building during the term of office of Mr. John G. Carlisle as Secretary of Treasury?

Mr. COX. I do not know. I suppose it is a great design.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman knew, he would know that the Supervising Architect of the Treasury had nothing whatever to do with it, and that Mr. Henry Ives Cobb, the celebrated architect, was appointed by Mr. John G. Carlisle to draw those plans and supervise the construction of that building.

Mr. COX. And I will undertake to say that the architecture of the public building in Chicago is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, it is demonstrated here beyond any doubt, no one has controverted the proposition, that the commissioners of this District, in open, notorious violation of the law of the country——

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, that is controverted, and it is denied in fact.

Mr. COX. Are going outside and hiring outside architects. Let them keep within the law. If they have not force enough in this bureau, let them go before the great Committee on Appropriations and ask for it, and I feel sure that no man on the floor of this House will undertake to vote against such a proposition. I hope the amendment will be voted in the bill. If it is done, it will be in the interest of economy and, in addition, will serve notice on the commissioners that they must obey the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, the pro forma amendments being considered as having been withdrawn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Cox) there were—ayes 18, noes 34.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Surveyor's office: Surveyor, $3,000; assistant surveyor, $2,000; clerks—1 at $1,225, 1 at $975, 1 at $675; 3 assistant engineers, at $1,500 each; computer, $1,200; record clerk, $1,050; inspector, $1,200; draftsmen—1 $1,225, 1 $900; assistant computer, $900; 3 rodmen, at $825 each; chainmen—3 at $700 each, 2 at $650 each; computer and transitman, $1,200; in all, $25,925.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the provision for an assistant surveyor, on line 4, at $2,000. That is an increase of $200 in the salary.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 4, after the word "surveyor" insert "$1,800."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Free Public Library, including Takoma Park branch: Librarian, $3,500; assistant librarian, $1,500; chief circulating department, $1,200; children's librarian, $1,000; librarian's secretary, $900; reference librarian, $1,000; assistants—1 $1,000; 6, including 1 in charge of Takoma Park branch, at $720 each, 5, including 1 for the Takoma Park branch, at $600 each, 3 at $540 each, 3, including 1 in charge of Takoma Park branch, at $480 each; copyist, $480; classifier, $900; cataloguers—1 $720, 1 $600, 2 at $540 each; stenographer and typewriter, $720; attendants—6 at $540 each, 5 at $480 each; collator, $480; 2 messengers, at $480 each; 10 pages, at $360 each; 2 janitors, at $480 each, 1 of whom shall act as night watchman; janitor of Takoma Park branch, $360; engineer, $1,080; fireman, $720; workman, $600; library guard, $720; 2 cloakroom attendants, at $360 each; 6 charwomen, at $180 each; in all, $41,900; and hereafter the Takoma Park branch shall be kept open on the same days and during the same hours as the Free Public Library shall be open to the public.

Mr. FOWLER rose.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] yield to his colleague from Illinois, Mr. FOSTER?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee. Does this provide for keeping the library open on Sundays?

Mr. BURLESON. It was to require those in charge of the public library to keep open the branch library at Takoma Park the same hours that the main library is kept open, in order that the people of that section of the city may receive the same service.

Mr. FOSTER. And that is on Sundays?

Mr. BURLESON. I do not remember. I think probably they do keep it open during some hours on Sunday.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I think I can explain that language, as I asked the questions respecting it in the hearings. The authorities in charge of that library have been in controversy with the committee because we insist on combining the Takoma Park branch and making it a mere adjunct and part of the main library, while they want it a separate institution, and ask for quite an elaborate clerical force. We did not meet their demands. The result is that during the current year they have been opening the Takoma branch only three days in the week, claiming that we had so cut down their clerical force that they were obliged to have those clerks during the other three days of the week, in order to keep up the work of the main library. A very careful and exhaustive examination of these gentlemen, who were perfectly sincere in their belief, undoubtedly, did not satisfy the committee that that was necessary, but we did believe that by adding one clerk at $600 that would give the very necessary help which they claimed and make it possible to keep open the Takoma branch library the same length of time and the same hours and days as is the main library. We have added one clerk, and we then say they must keep it open, because we believe that they sincerely believe they can not keep it open with the one clerk, and therefore they might not keep it open, to the detriment of the people in the neighborhood of Takoma Park, unless they were directed to do so.

Mr. FOSTER. So this additional clerk is for the purpose of keeping that library open the extra hours?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes; and extra days. We insist upon that being done at Takoma Park, and the branch is to be kept open.

Mr. FOSTER. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, on page 13, line 9, I move to strike out the words "one hundred and eighty" and insert the words "two hundred and forty." Now, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 13, line 9, by striking out "$180" and inserting "$240."

Mr. BURLESON. On that I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. I will reserve the right to object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I know the item is subject to the point of order, but I ask the gentleman from Texas to waive it and let the House determine whether or not the pay should be increased.

Mr. BURLESON. I will do it if the gentleman will agree for the House to pass upon the points of order which the gentleman proposes to make to this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; I will not do anything of the kind.

Mr. BURLESON. I will be glad to permit the House to pass on them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have no doubt the gentleman will be willing to exchange $1,000,000 for $180.

Mr. BURLESON. I reserve the point of order in order that the gentlemen may discuss it.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to increase materially the appropriation in this bill as it comes from the hand of this intelligent committee. The library building is used six days in the week by the public. There is a provision in this bill requiring it to be kept open on Sunday, making seven days in the week, which use undoubtedly would cause the accumulation of deleterious matter and would require as much time to clean it as any building in this city.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FOWLER. Surely.

Mr. BURLESON. Does the gentleman from Illinois know how long these employees are engaged in their labors?

Mr. FOWLER. Well, I only know what is required at the House Office Building. It takes the women there from two to four hours to clean that building, and I suppose that the time required there is about the average required by the force employed in other public buildings.

Mr. BURLESON. Then I understand the gentleman does not claim to have any knowledge with reference to the situation in the library?

Mr. FOWLER. Only in a general way. I have understood that it requires from two to four hours' work to clean this building.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, I will state to the gentleman that he is mistaken about that. I will ask the gentleman now, does he know how many people are engaged in the performance of this service?

Mr. FOWLER. Only what the bill carries—the bill for six charwomen in that vast library where concourse after concourse of people go for the purpose of reading.

Mr. BURLESON. But the gentleman will admit that an entirely different character of population visits the Municipal Building from that which visits the library building, will he not?

Mr. FOWLER. Well, I do not know; of course there is always a difference in the class of people visiting the different buildings because of the business transacted in the buildings.

Mr. BURLESON. That is the point; so the gentleman concedes that proposition, and admits he has absolutely no information——

Mr. FOWLER. No; I do not admit I have no information, because I have been making inquiries concerning it. I have made that my business, and I do not know of any building in the city or used by the Government where charwomen are paid such low wage.

So I seek by this amendment to try to equalize the pay so that these women may receive a better salary for their services.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly; if I may have the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I ask unanimous consent that it be extended for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAUNDERS. These women are paid for work of two or three hours a day; we will say that it is three hours.

Mr. FOWLER. The information I have is that they average from two to four hours.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Then they are paid at the rate of $90 a month on the basis of a day of eight hours.

Mr. FOWLER. One hundred and eighty dollars a year.

Mr. SAUNDERS. If they are paid at the rate of $15 a month, it would be at the rate of three times that, or $45 a month, for an eight-hour day. That is pretty good compensation.

Mr. FOWLER. If you see fit to analyze time in that way——

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is a fair way to do it.

Mr. FOWLER. When one is required to do short-hour work at a certain time it is very hard to get employment at other work in other places in a piecemeal and dodge-about way.

Mr. SAUNDERS. This is not a dodge-about way; it is a fixed time in the evening of the day.

Mr. FOWLER. But to get additional work at other places under other masters in order to make up a fair salary for the day or the month does involve much dodge-about uncertainty in getting steady employment.

Mr. SAUNDERS. We have no information to the effect that that trouble exists. On the contrary, we are informed that there is great competition for these places, and they are regarded as desirable places at the wages that they carry.

Mr. FOWLER. It is true that there is great competition, and there is great poverty which requires the competition. If the business was elevated to a higher level, with a better wage, the number of applicants would increase so rapidly that you could not get office room sufficient to accommodate the additional applicants.

Mr. SAUNDERS. For that reason we do not care to increase it. Your statement in that respect is true.

Mr. FOWLER. I say that there ought to be an adequate wage for the character of work done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has again expired.

Mr. FOWLER. I trust the gentleman will permit the question to be passed on by the committee.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, the Public Library is under the control of a board of directors made up of some of the most reputable citizens in this District. The chairman of the board is Mr. Theodore Noyes, who has always taken the deepest interest in this library and its condition. He has repeatedly appeared before the subcommittee and urged certain increases for the library force, and certain increases in the compensation of the various employees of the library. I am quite sure that Mr. Noyes and his fellow members have not overlooked a single class of employees connected with the library who deserve an increase. Yet they never have urged at any time an increase in the compensation of this particular force. I feel quite sure that if this was not adequate compensation for the service that is being rendered, Mr. Noyes would have brought it to the attention of the subcommittee.

I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Miscellaneous, Free Public Library, including Takoma Park branch: For books, periodicals, and newspapers, including payment in advance for subscriptions to periodicals, newspapers, subscription books, and society publications, $7,500.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FOSTER. May I inquire of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] if last year's bill did not provide for the purchase of books, periodicals, and newspapers, and this does not?

Mr. BURLESON. There is certain additional language there. The additional language is—

Including payment in advance for subscriptions to periodicals, newspapers, subscription books, and society publications.

Under the rule of many publishing houses they will not furnish their publications without a prepayment of the subscription, and it was necessary that this language should be embodied in the bill in order to meet that requirement.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand; but in last year's bill you provided, as I remember, for the purchase of books.

Mr. BURLESON. This does that, too. We dropped out the word "purchase" because it was surplusage.

Mr. FOSTER. That includes it, does it?

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Last year you had that, but you did not have the other language. I wondered if this gave you the necessary authority.

Mr. BURLESON. It does.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Telephones connected with the system of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. may be maintained in the residences of the superintendent of the water department, superintendent of sewers, secretary of the Board of Charities, health officer, chief engineer of the fire department, and superintendent of police, of the District of Columbia, under appropriations contained in this act.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that paragraph. It is clearly subject to it.

Mr. BURLESON. That is true; but will the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. COX. I will reserve it.

Mr. BURLESON. Under the paragraph carried in the legislative appropriation bill last year payment for telephones installed in the offices of the various employees of the Federal Government in the executive departments is prohibited. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia estimated in this bill for 12 telephones, informing us originally that various employees in the District government had requested telephones to the number of 52. They had that many at the time this item that I have referred to was embodied last year in the legislative appropriation bill. The commissioners reduced the number to 12. Subsequently they submitted to us a list of the officials that they thought should be furnished with telephones. This list embraced twenty-odd employees of the District government.

The subcommittee went over the list carefully. In that list were telephones for the commissioners and for the secretaries to the commissioners and various other employees. The subcommittee went over the list carefully, I say, and, considering only the interests of the people of the District of Columbia, considering only the efficiency of the municipal public service, we reduced the number to six, as now carried in the bill. We believe that the burden of paying for a telephone should not be imposed upon the superintendent of sewers, to illustrate, or on the superintendent of the water department or on the chief engineer of the fire department. It is in the interest of the people that these officials should be promptly reached if their services are required; and believing that, we embodied in the bill this item to furnish these particular officials with telephone service at the cost of the District.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Your bill does not say how many you purpose to carry by your appropriation.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. It provides for six. It names them specifically.

Mr. FOWLER. They are denominated.

Mr. BURLESON. Each one is specified.

Mr. COX. What do these telephones cost?

Mr. BURLESON. I think the cost is $4 a month.

Mr. COX. Four dollars a month?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

Mr. COX. This request is in violation of the law passed last year, is it not?

Mr. BURLESON. This is intended to meet that situation. It is to modify the law, in so far as these particular officials are concerned.

Mr. COX. But, as I understand the law as it now exists, there can not be any appropriation made for any of these officials, and this is an exception to the law passed last year?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; for these particular persons that we have enumerated.

Mr. COX. I do not see any reason why that should be done. It seems, according to the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], that the plan is gradually to enlarge the list next year, and then the year after, so that in the course of a very few years the law passed last year will be virtually emasculated and destroyed and the total number will eventually be restored that were in last year. I can not see, Mr. Chairman, any reason at all for the item remaining in this bill, for the reason that the very titles of the persons to whom it is proposed to give these telephones show that they are all high-priced and high-salaried men.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. COX. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] insists on his point of order.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The purpose of the committee was not in any sense to begin a raid against the legislation carried in last year's measure. But if you will look at the particular officials designated, you will find that each one of these men is at the head of what might be termed an emergency department, subject to call at any hour of the day or night.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman believe they ought to pay their own telephone bills at their own private residences, telephones which they can use for their own personal purposes?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. No.

Mr. COX. If it is true, let us live up to the law.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. These men, by reason of their positions, are called upon officially at all hours and should be in close touch with the public.

Mr. COX. There is no question about that; but let them pay for their own telephones.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. They may be called upon at any time to meet a serious emergency. That is why the committee have made this allowance, and they are the only ones we ever will allow, as far as the present subcommittee is concerned.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. LOBECK. I want to commend the committee for making the recommendation for these six persons who are named here. No up-to-date city in the country requires that the superintendent of a water department shall pay for his own telephone at his home. From heavy rainfalls sewers at any point in a city may be flooded. The superintendent of sewers must keep a telephone at home, so that he can be called in his official capacity. He may be called at any hour of the night. There may be a flood in any portion of the city, and his men call him up. The same can be said of every one of these six men named here. They must be in touch with their departments at all times. It is necessary that they should have telephones convenient, for the protection of property and of the people of this city, and no up-to-date city requires the heads of this class of municipal departments to pay for telephones, but telephone service is paid for by the taxpayers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. COX. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For carrying out the provisions of the act approved March 1, 1899, entitled "An act to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to remove dangerous or unsafe buildings and parts thereof, and for other purposes," to pay the members of the board of survey provided for therein, other than the inspector of buildings, at a compensation of not to exceed $10 for each survey, and to pay the cost of making safe or removing such buildings upon the refusal or neglect of the owners so to do, the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for this purpose for the fiscal year 1913 is reappropriated for the fiscal year 1914.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that paragraph, because lines 22, 23, 24, and 25 are legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BURLESON. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The unexpended balance of this appropriation is reappropriated.

Mr. BURLESON. There was an unexpended balance in this fund last year.

Mr. FOSTER. How much?

Mr. BURLESON. About $7,500, or something in excess of $7,000, and instead of appropriating directly out of the Treasury, we have reappropriated the unexpended balance, as one means of keeping up with the expenditures that are being made by the board.

Mr. FOSTER. Do you appropriate enough each year then to keep up this fund? I notice that last year the sum of $2,000 was appropriated.

Mr. BURLESON. We try to make the appropriation adequate for the service that is to be performed. Sometimes in a fund of this kind the amount appropriated is not all expended, and we frequently reappropriate the amount. It is not unusual in appropriation bills. There is no change in the law. It is done in order to avoid duplication of appropriations. It is a good practice, and I think it is not a violation of any of the rules of the House. It is one recognized form of appropriating money.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, under the covering-in act this money would go back into the Treasury. These four lines suspend the operation of the covering-in act, so far as this appropriation is concerned, and reappropriate it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The point of order is overruled.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter any final judgment or decree of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia may be reexamined, affirmed, reversed, or modified by the Supreme Court of the United States, upon writ of error or appeal, in all cases wherein is involved the validity or infringement of any patent in which the District of Columbia, or the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or a contractor doing work for the District of Columbia under a contract where said commissioners assume responsibility for infringement of patent rights, or any of them, are parties in interest, and all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions hereof are hereby repealed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the pagagraph on the ground that it is new legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In explanation of this, Mr. Chairman, I will say that there is a claim made that there is a patent on so simple a thing as asphalt pavement. In order to be entirely rid of any annoyance on that score, a bill was prepared and introduced into the House, went before the District Committee, a favorable report was made on the bill, it came before the House, and was passed practically unanimously and is now before the Senate. This ought to become a law for the protection of the commissioners in the building of streets in the District of Columbia. If it can not become a law in the regular way, there is no excuse for its not becoming a law in this way.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this is clearly new legislation. It is injecting into an appropriation bill legislation that does not pertain particularly to it. It multiplies the work imposed upon the Supreme Court of the United States and involves the question of the interminability of suits at law. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does not the gentleman think as important a question as this ought to be dealt with by the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If it is a question of such importance, I will say to the gentleman it ought to come up as new legislation, to be discussed in the regular way.

Mr. BARTLETT. It has passed the House unanimously.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist upon his point of order?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Condemnation of streets, roads, and alleys: For purchase or condemnation of streets, roads, and alleys, $1,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order upon that. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not think it well to limit the appropriation of money for condemnation purposes to alleys? The law does not apply to streets and roads.

Mr. BURLESON. As I understand, there is a general law authorizing the condemnation of streets and assessing all the damages and benefits to property owners.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But you are asking money for it.

Mr. BURLESON. Only a thousand dollars.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Does not the gentleman think it had better be limited to alleys?

Mr. BURLESON. I do not, for the money is expended only in very rare instances, to meet emergencies.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

The part of Twentieth Street NW., in the District of Columbia, beginning at Park Road and extending north along the west side of square 2617 to the north end of said square, shall hereafter be designated Park Road; and the part of said Twentieth Street beginning at Park Road and extending south along square 2604 to Adams Mill Road shall hereafter be designated Walbridge Place.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that that is new legislation.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Will the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this legislation arises from the peculiar condition with reference to Twentieth Street and a street also called Twentieth Street, located, I should say, a mile away from it; not in a direct line with it, but entirely across Rock Creek Park from Twentieth Street as we know it. Carrying out Twentieth Street as far as they could up to the park, the commissioners ran across the park and found a little road about one block long that is, in fact, Park Road, and named it Twentieth Street. The next block, and all the rest of the road, is called Park Road. The matter was brought to our attention by the commissioners and by a Member of this House, the gentleman from Wyoming, Mr. MONDELL, who lives on this part called Twentieth Street. He and his neighbors have unanimously petitioned for this change because their friends and those who come from the stores are unable to find them. They go as far as they can on Twentieth Street and find no such house number and give it up. It is to meet an unusual condition and an error made by some previous Board of Commissioners by which the street, which is in no way attached to Twentieth Street, not on a direct line with it and more than a mile away, was erroneously named, and, as I say, the balance of it is called Park Road. We thought it was to meet a pressing emergency and we have put it in the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I believe that I will insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized, in their discretion, to use such portion of public space lying south of Water Street and east of Fourteenth Street SW. as may, in their judgment, be necessary for the site of an asphalt plant and the storage yards and other necessary accessories therefor, and to construct a bulkhead on the water side of said site, upon such lines as they may deem necessary to rectify the present bulkhead line: Provided, That the District of Columbia shall pay to the United States as compensation for the land contained in said site one-half the estimated value thereof, namely, $19,500, and there is hereby appropriated, entirely from the revenues of the District of Columbia, said sum of $19,500, which shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the United States, and thereafter the title to said property shall be in the name of the District of Columbia. And they are further authorized to establish, construct or purchase, maintain, and operate, on the site above described, an asphalt plant with the necessary accessory structures, materials, means of transportation, road rollers, tools and machinery, and railroad sidings, all or any part of the above work to be executed by day labor or contract, as in the judgment of the commissioners may be deemed most advantageous to the District of Columbia, and the cost of the same and of any necessary incidental or contingent expenses in connection therewith shall be paid from the appropriation for "Repairs streets, avenues, and alleys" made herein: Provided further, That the total expenditure under the above authorization for an asphalt plant shall not exceed the sum of $90,000; and the portable asphalt plant purchased under the appropriation for repairs of streets, avenues, and alleys for the fiscal year 1913 may be operated under the immediate direction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in doing such work of resurfacing and repairs to asphalt pavements, in the repair of macadam streets by constructing on such macadam streets an asphalt macadam wearing surface and in the construction of asphaltic macadam surfaces on concrete base, as in their judgment may be economically performed by the use of said plant, and so much of this appropriation as is necessary for the purposes aforesaid is hereby made available for such work.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the paragraph that it is new legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I also make the point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I have a substitute which I desire to offer as an amendment in lieu of the paragraph stricken out, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The portable asphalt plant purchased under the appropriation for repairs of streets, avenues, and alleys for the fiscal year 1913 may be operated under the immediate direction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in doing such work of resurfacing and repairs to asphalt pavements, in the repair of macadam streets by constructing on such macadam streets an asphalt macadam wearing surface and in the construction of asphaltic macadam surfaces on concrete base, as in their judgment may be economically performed by the use of said plant, and so much of this appropriation as is necessary for the purposes aforesaid is hereby made available for such work.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the committee I would like to make a statement in this connection. This is an apparatus, or machine that the city now owns. It is in use at the present time for the repair of streets. In its practical operation it has proved to be most efficient and economical, but there is not enough work to occupy it all the time. In the course of its use for the purposes of repair, the District authorities have ascertained as a practical proposition, as a matter of dollars and cents, that it could be economically used for the actual paving of short sections of the streets. It is not proposed to go into general street paving and this proposition has nothing to do with any asphalt plant proposition. The paragraph is simply intended to authorize the District of Columbia to use machinery which it already owns, to the fullest extent of its economic possibilities. That is all there is to the proposition. The officials have ascertained that short sections of the street can be paved most economically in this way. They give the figures, and ask only to be allowed to use this machine for paving during such hours as it is not in use for the repair of streets. This use will effect a most desirable and economical result.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is this work that would ordinarily be advertised for?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, I so understand.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would there be any competition brought about by advertising for this kind of work?

Mr. SAUNDERS. So far as that is concerned, there would be no advertising for the relatively small amount of paving that this machine would do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then there would be some competition?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, no, so far as the question of competition is concerned, that would be eliminated. The city has ascertained, so that it is no longer a matter of theory, that short sections of the street, when other sections of the street are pulled up, can be paved by the use of this portable plant. The machine reduces the material, and it is then used for the paving of these short sections.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The city owns the plant?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes. It is proposed to utilize a present piece of machinery for certain paving that can be economically done by its use.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, there have been persistent efforts made during the last few years to build a municipal asphalt plant. Each of those efforts carried with it the giving away of the public domain. Because of that, more than for any other reason, I have each time opposed the establishment of a municipal asphalt plant. After the proposition had several times met defeat at the hands of the House, then the commissioners came with a proposition to expend $7,500 for a portable asphalt plant for the purpose of repairing holes and breaks in the asphalt streets. It was not contemplated, in so far as anybody knew, that they were to go further, but it now develops that that $7,500 plant was the camel's head being stuck in, because immediately following that comes the proposition that the law compelling competitive bids and the advertising for the work to be done by competitive bid is to be done away with, and this $7,500 plant to be succeeded, most likely, with a $175,000 plant, which will become a permanent fixture. When that happens, that the work is being done by day laborers under perhaps an extravagant commission and is not being done as cheaply as it could be had from a contractor, then this law is permanent and we must go ahead under that system. It repeals the contract system, and believing—having no doubt in my own mind—that this is, as I said, an instance of the camel's head, the next step will be entirely within the house, and the camel will be the sole occupant. Now, it was contemplated in the first place, as I said, to give up Government domain. Then the bill comes along with another proposition to pay half of what somebody says this public domain is worth, and the figure fixed for one-half of it is $19,000. I have contended upon the floor of this House before, and I again repeat, that if you pass the amendment just now offered the next step taken will be to find a place to store the material for this $7,500 asphalt plant. That will require a roof. Then it will be immediately proposed to be enlarged into a permanent municipal asphalt plant, and perhaps put upon this very valuable piece of property lying in the District of Columbia, which I have said before, and I repeat now, is the most valuable piece of water front in the District of Columbia, as bounded upon the south is the main channel of the Potomac and bounded upon the west is the railroad track which reaches the railroad trains and gives access by railroad to all the world; and, as I said, it also runs on the main channel of the Potomac River and has water access to all the world, yet the commissioners come and tell us that it is worth a dollar a foot. I have made some investigation——

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. I will state that I thought that was the gentleman's objection to this project last year, and we tried to meet the objection by imposing upon the District government the burden of paying for one-half of the lot that is to be occupied, and I will state to him that I am perfectly willing that he should place an estimate upon this property in any sum he sees fit and I will accept it as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Well, the gentleman is assuming both for myself and for himself; but I believe, Mr. Chairman, as I was about to say, that the $7,500 movable asphalt plant was the camel's head. That was simply to do patchwork. Now they come and want to do street work. And when this $7,500 plant appears to be too small, then what are they going to do? Ask for a bigger one, and get it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. SAUNDERS, Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania, and Mr. REDFIELD rose.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky reserves the point of order, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD], a member of the committee.

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that I was not in the House when this subject of the asphalt plant came up, because I have had peculiar experience in connection with this matter, and I think I may venture for a few moments to lay the results of that before the committee. When I was commissioner of public works in the borough of Brooklyn, in New York City, in 1902 and 1903, the department under my care laid 100 miles of asphalt pavement in two years. We had something like 300 miles of asphalt streets. There was one particular problem with which the contract system under which we had to work could not deal well, and that was the problem of street repairs. I found it literally impossible to proceed under contract with that particular item for a very practical reason. Street repairs are caused by plumbers' cuts and by odd breaks in pavements here and there. They will be a yard or less in area and will occur in scattered places. No contractor can estimate accurately the cost of doing these little petty items of work scattered over hundreds of miles of streets. We finally got an asphalt plant largely for that purpose, with the result that the cost of the work was cut about in half and greatly increased in quality. Now, the next item was the item of small repairs, such as resurfacing small areas. That can not be done economically by contract, because the quantities are too small and the places are too scattered to permit the contractor to properly estimate upon it, and for a like reason we carried our municipal asphalt plant into that service, with the admirable effect, Mr. Chairman, of cutting the cost down largely and increasing the quality of the work greatly.

The using of this small plant for small jobs of resurfacing may be, as my friend from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] says, the entering of the camel's head. If it be, then experience shows, Mr. Chairman, it is a mighty good camel. Personally I speak from having myself done, I think, as much as any other man to destroy the Asphalt Trust. I carried on a combat with that trust every day for many long months and drove it out of the streets of Brooklyn entirely and put in free competition. I am the last man to speak in favor of anything in the world which restricts the freedom of action on the part of contractors, but this is a particular element in street work of which I speak from practical knowledge, which can not properly be done by large contractors and which can not be economically done by small ones. I hope the measure will prevail as it stands.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, as I said, I wish to address myself to the point of order, because I do not consider that this item is properly subject to a point of order. This paragraph comes within the operation of the Holman rule, because it reduces the amount covered by the bill. It reduces the amount that would otherwise be necessary for the operations to which this bill relates.

Now, as to whether or not a permanent plant would reduce the expenses, that would be a matter of speculation. A paragraph providing for such a plant would clearly be subject to a point of order. Its operation would be a prospective and problematical matter. But with respect to a plant of the kind in present use, in this city, it has been tested, and we have the figures in relation to its operation. Its cost of operation is no longer a question of speculation, but a matter of easy verification. That is the difference between this, and an entire asphalt proposition. With such a proposition we are not concerned at this time. If the experience of the city with this temporary plant is satisfactory, and it is proved to be a good thing then we ought to go further and provide for a complete and permanent asphalt plant. But that is another proposition. It might be good legislation to provide for such a plant, but we are not considering such a plant in the present measure. In this connection I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the figures relating to the particular use of the plant for which this authority is asked. There is no question but that the paragraph is new legislation, and unless it can be shown that the new legislation proposed will reduce expenses, it is clearly subject to a point of order. We admit that. But if it is shown that it will reduce expenses, then it comes within the rulings that have been made touching the Holman rule.

Permit me to call the attention of the Chair to the situation with respect to this portable plant. This plant, according to the testimony before us in the hearings—and there is nothing to the contrary—has been highly successful. With it the city is now repairing all the places where the streets are cut to lay pipes of any kind. All the holes that occur in the street are repaired with this same plant. But this use occupies only a portion of its time. It is a familiar proposition of business that hardly requires any demonstration, that when you own a piece of property, which in its limited use is operated economically, you can increase that use with an additional resulting economy. That is what is proposed to be done here. It is proposed to make further use of an existing apparatus that has demonstrated its utility and economy, so as to reduce expenses still further by its operation.

Now, for what purpose would that plant be used under the authority of this paragraph? A small section of street——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman tell whether there was authority in law for the purchase of this plant?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, yes. It was put in the bill last year, but its use was limited to the repair of cuts and holes, in a word to repair work pure and simple.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How much is involved by its use?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Relatively little. The city can not go into a large business with one small machine. It is a matter of only a few hours' work additional to its present use.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If it were a matter of a thousand dollars and merely smoothing off edges here and there, I think there could be no serious objection to it; but if it is a matter of a thousand dollars, where competition would be eliminated——

Mr. SAUNDERS. No competition involved here, as I will show the gentleman in a minute.

There is a provision in this bill for macadamizing a short section of street by the Pan American Building.

Should that section be paved by the asphalt company here, and no other can practically compete with it the paving would be done according to a contract price. It is proposed to give authority for the use of the portable plant, so far as it can be used, to pave short sections of street with the material that is dug up elsewhere. Thus they will do this paving with city labor, city material, and city plant. Only a few sections, comparatively speaking, or a few blocks, would be paved in the course of a year, by the use of this machine, but a valuable object lesson might be furnished.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course, the gentleman realizes that if that work were extended it would mean the establishment of a new bureau in the District of Columbia?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Possibly, but that would require additional legislation. This is purely a business proposition. If its operation proves to be economical and effective, the gentleman would desire to extend it, would he not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I see no objection to it if it is used simply in smoothing off edges, and so forth.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It is small construction work that is intended to be provided for.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There being warrant of law for it?

Mr. SAUNDERS. There is warrant of law for the repair of streets, but not for the paving of streets. Permit me to give you the figures in this connection, from the hearings:

Mr. BURLESON. Could you do the work on the street between the Bureau of American Republics and the Daughters of the American Revolution buildings in that way?

The answer was:

Col. JUDSON. Yes; we could do that very easily.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Whose answer is it?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Col. Judson's answer. He said:

Yes; we could do that very easily.

Then the colloquy proceeded—

Mr. BURLESON. That could be done with this portable asphalt plant?

Col. JUDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURLESON. And could be done very much cheaper than by contract?

Col. JUDSON. Yes. I may say that these figures are worked out most carefully by Mr. McComb, who is a very careful man, from the best data that could be obtained in the country. He showed that, per cubic foot, the standard asphalt material for repairs cost 54.4 cents by contract; that it would cost 41.84 cents with a fixed municipal plant, and that it cost 45.6 cents with a portable plant, which, as you will see, is intermediate. What is capable of being done by a portable plant is based on what has actually been done. What could be done here with a municipal fixed plant is, of course, just a matter of calculation.

This matter of the work that can be done with this portable plant, is no longer a question of speculation.

These figures, and the experience of the city differentiate as clearly as can be done, the difference between the pending proposition and one for an entire plant. In the one case we have the results of actual experience, in the other the inquiry would be speculative. The effect of this legislation will be to reduce expenses. In its work this repair plant has already reduced expenses. Hence it has been demonstrated that in its further use, a further reduction of expenses will be effected. Therefore it is within the benefit of the Holman rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, this is a very plain proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not know whether the Chair will rule with me or against me. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. If the ruling of the Chair is not satisfactory to the gentleman, the Chair will reopen his mind. The point of order made against the amendment appears, of course, in the RECORD. The members of the committee as well as the Chairman are familiar with the splendid and elaborate opinion rendered construing the Holman rule and applied to a somewhat similar proposition by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS]; also the opinion by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]; and by the distingushed gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], who presided over the committee about a year ago when this bill was under consideration; and lest the Chair may not state these rulings so clearly and differentiate as thoroughly and accurately as those gentlemen did, the present occupant of the chair will only direct attention to those lucid interpretations of the Holman rule and announce that, enlightened and guided by these precedents, it is his judgment that the amendment is not safely within the Holman rule, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment. I offer the same amendment with additional words added after the last word of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

The Clerk read as follows:

The portable asphalt plant purchased under the appropriation for repairs of streets, avenues, and alleys for the fiscal year 1913 may be operated under the immediate direction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in doing such work of resurfacing and repairs to asphalt pavements, in the repair of macadam streets by constructing on such macadam streets an asphalt macadam wearing surface and in the construction of asphaltic macadam surfaces on concrete base, as in their judgment may be economically performed by the use of said plant, and so much of this appropriation as is necessary for the purposes aforesaid is hereby made available for such work: Provided, That the powers herein conferred shall not be exercised except under conditions that will insure the doing of the work contemplated hereunder at prices that shall be less per square yard than such or similar work can be done by contract.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] makes a point of order on the amendment. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SAUNDERS. May I have a moment, Mr. Chairman? This amendment meets the objection sustained by the Chairman in his former ruling. The face of this amendment carries a reduction. Unquestionably this amendment is legislation, but it effects a reduction. The apparatus can be utilized under this amendment provided the cost of operation is less than the cost of the same work, if it be done by contract. If the work can not be done with this portable machine at less than the contract price per cubic yard, then the machine shall not be used at all.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair, the provisions of the Holman rule are not satisfied by this conditional and contingent provision for retrenchment. This amendment provides for the operation of a certain instrumentality upon the express condition that if at some time hereafter, in the judgment and opinion of those District officers employing and operating it, it may be employed so as to reduce expenses. As in this case, more specifically stated, the amendment may retrench or it may not retrench, dependent on opinion of some other authority than the House, and provided some future ascertainment will justify the experiment. Whether there will be a reduction of expenses is to be determined by the judgment of those executing the work under one system, as compared with the cost of the work under the system now employed by the District. The rule requires the House to legislate a positive, not a contingent or equivocal reduction. The House may and does nominate others to carry retrenchment into effect, but so long as the language of the amendment shows on its face that there may never be a saving or attempted saving by the legislation, if enacted, it is impossible for the Chair to rule that the amendment will retrench expenditures. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in that connection I call attention to the paragraph on page 20 which we have just passed, which fixes a limit of $1.80 per square yard for this kind of work. There was an opportunity for the gentleman offering the amendment to establish the efficiency of the rule by fixing a rate which might lower the cost. Rather than that he has left it to the discretion of the commissioners.

Mr. BURLESON. I ask unanimous consent that this item may be passed until we can prepare an amendment, and that the Clerk proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I understand that the Chair has ruled, so the only question will be whether the Chair will reopen the question or not.

Mr. BURLESON. No; we are going to offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If at any time it should come to the attention of the Chair that he had made an incorrect ruling, he would be perfectly willing to correct that ruling, but the Chair has no doubt of the correctness of his ruling at this time.

Mr. BURLESON. I am not asking the Chair to reopen the matter at all. I am just asking the Chair to pass this until we can prepare a new amendment, and proceed with the reading of the bill in order not to lose any time.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this paragraph will be passed with that understanding, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The authority given the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in the act making appropriations for the expenses of the District of Columbia, approved March 2, 1907, to make such changes in the lines of the curb of Pennsylvania Avenue and its intersecting streets in connection with their resurfacing as they may consider necessary and advisable is made applicable to such other streets and avenues as may be improved hereafter under appropriations: Provided, That no such change shall be made unless there shall result therefrom a decrease in the cost of the improvement.

Mr. FOSTER. I make a point of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] makes a point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman reserve it for an explanation?

Mr. FOSTER. I reserve it.

Mr. BURLESON. The purpose of this is to enable the commissioners to narrow a street or shift the curbing from the line prescribed by the highway plan, in order to save the lives of a line of trees. Frequently in resurfacing a street to establish a new line of curbing, it becomes necessary to cut down through the roots of the trees which are close to the street and sidewalk being recurbed. This results in the killing of the trees. The sole purpose of this is to give the same authority which was conferred upon the District Commissioners with reference to Pennsylvania Avenue and the streets adjacent thereto, and to extend this authority to other streets, provided, in every case, that the expense shall be less.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that last year we had this provision in the bill, with some modifications from this. This makes it permanent law, and does not propose to limit it to the appropriations made at this time. It makes it the law for all time to come.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They did not do what they said they would on Pennsylvania Avenue. They have torn up old curbing and put down new curbing in the same place.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think we ought to make this the law until it is thoroughly considered by the committee having jurisdiction of such matters.

Mr. BURLESON. As I understand, then, the gentleman objects to the use of the word "hereafter," which makes it permanent?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. BURLESON. Then I ask unanimous consent that the word "hereafter" may be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. In what line?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In line 8, page 27.

The CHAIRMAN. With the point of order reserved, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] asks unanimous consent to consider the paragraph, and that the word "hereafter" may be stricken out. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. And then put in the words "contained in this act" after the word "appropriation."

Mr. BURLESON. All right. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 8, strike out the word "hereafter." In line 9, after the word "appropriation," insert the words "contained in this act."

Mr. BURLESON. That is all right. I accept that amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Highway Bridge across Potomac River: Draw operators—2, at $1,020 each, one $720; 4 watchmen, at $720 each; labor, $1,500; lighting, power, and miscellaneous supplies, and expenses of every kind necessarily incident to the operation and maintenance of the bridge and approaches, $8,620; in all, $15,760.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the item of $720 in line 24, page 27. It is an increase of salary of $120.

Mr. BURLESON. It is subject to a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BURLESON. I move to amend by inserting the figures "$600."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 24, insert "$600" at the beginning of the line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the construction of a bridge across Rock Creek on the lines of Pennsylvania Avenue, in accordance with plans approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and the said commissioners are authorized to enter into a contract or contracts for said work at a total cost not to exceed $160,000, of which so much thereof as may be necessary is authorized to be used for carrying suitable water mains across Rock Creek, to replace those now carried over said creek, to be immediately available and remain available until expended, $25,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, to that I reserve a point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, this item makes provision for the construction of a new bridge across Pennsylvania Avenue. The old bridge across Pennsylvania Avenue beyond Washington Circle is quite old. For many years it has been regarded in a measure as insecure, if not unsafe; it is quite narrow, and the street car company is unable to cross it because it is not of sufficient strength to uphold their cars. By reason of their inability to cross it they pass over on N Street, making a very abrupt and, in a way, dangerous turn.

For a number of years the people in Georgetown have been petitioning the Committee on Appropriations to provide for the construction of this new bridge. It is not a monumental bridge, although the plans they have in mind will provide a bridge in form and in the general outline and in the general appearance of the other bridges that have been constructed across Rock Creek.

The committee has endeavored, as far as they could, to safeguard the interests of the District in this paragraph. The original estimate provided that 15 per cent should be assessed against the railroad company as their portion of the contract part of the construction of this bridge.

The subcommittee were inclined to the belief that that was not a sufficient amount to be paid by the railroad company. They directed the municipal authorities to take a census of the traffic at that point—a census of the foot passengers, vehicles, and tonnage as well. They carefully considered the data furnished and reached the conclusion that the railroad company should bear at least 33⅓ per cent of the total cost of the construction of the bridge.

Under the general law the railroad, after this bridge has been constructed, will be compelled to bear 50 per cent of the cost of maintenance. I believe, in brief, those are the main reasons for the appropriation.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. COX. I see it authorizes the commissioners to enter into a contract or contracts for said work, the total cost not to exceed $160,000. I would like to know how that contract is let; is it by open competition?

Mr. BURLESON. By competitive bids.

Mr. COX. Bids called for in the newspapers?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; in the usual way.

Mr. COX. Open competitive bids, to be let to the lowest responsible bidder?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes. There is no possibility of collusion, and I want to say that the District has been remarkably free from graft in the construction of the great improvements that we have made here for a number of years past.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. I will.

Mr. LOBECK. In making the plans has consideration been given to the proposed roadway to the Potomac?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; some consideration has been given that, and provision made for it.

Mr. LOBECK. It is proposed to put a road down through there to the Potomac.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BURLESON. I ask for two minutes more.

[By unanimous consent, the time of Mr. BURLESON was extended two minutes.]

Mr. COX. Is the gentleman prepared from memory to tell us something about the tonnage and traffic that passes over this point?

Mr. BURLESON. I believe it is in the hearings.

Mr. COX. While they are looking that up, I will ask this question: Has the gentleman any estimate of what the total cost will be when finally completed?

Mr. BURLESON. One hundred and sixty thousand dollars. I neglected to state that there will be certain real estate acquired for the abutments of this bridge. All the damages are to be assessed as benefits.

Mr. COX. Let me see if I understand the gentleman. The amount carried by this bill is $160,000 for a bridge, and, as I understand it, that is the total cost of the bridge. Is that correct?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly.

Mr. COX. And of that sum of $160,000 does the gentleman say that the railroad company will be required to pay 33⅓ per cent?

Mr. BURLESON. Thirty-three and one-third per cent of the $160,000.

Mr. COX. So that the only cost to the District of Columbia would be $160,000 less 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. BURLESON. The railroad company will pay 33⅓ per cent, the District of Columbia will pay 33⅓ per cent, and the General Government will pay 33⅓ per cent, and under the general law the railroad company will pay 50 per cent of the cost of maintenance of the bridge.

Mr. COX. Do I understand the gentleman desires to put something in the RECORD from the hearings?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes. I read from pages 261 and 262, from a letter addressed to me by Engineer Commissioner Judson:

This census was taken betwen the hours of 7 a. m. and 7 p. m., January 9, 1913. Calculated on the theory that the traffic across the proposed new bridge would equal the total street railway traffic now crossing the M Street Bridge, the total of traffic now crossing the present Pennsylvania Avenue Bridge, and one-half of all the other traffic, exclusive of street railway traffic, now crossing the M Street Bridge, the estimated traffic over the proposed new bridge would be as follows:

	Tons.	Passengers.
Street railway	10,336	10,785
Other traffic	3,105	6,912

Mr. COX. That is per day.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; per day.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That was taken between 7 and 7.

Mr. BURLESON. Showing that the street car traffic was more than twice what the other traffic amounts to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky, who makes the point of order, how he differentiates between this paragraph, which the Chair will read, which is a part of the present bill, and a paragraph from which he will quote, from Hinds' Precedents. The Chair reads the first few lines of the pending paragraph:

For the construction of a bridge across Rock Creek, on the lines of Pennsylvania Avenue, in accordance with plans approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia—

And so forth. The Chair finds a ruling made on May 4, 1906, by Mr. Chairman DALZELL, in Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, page 531:

The construction of a bridge on a road in the District of Columbia was held to be the continuation of a public work. On May 4, 1900, the sundry civil appropriation bill being under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, this paragraph was read:

"For construction of a bridge across Rock Creek on the line of the roadway from Quarry Road entrance, under the direction of engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia, $22,000, one-half of which sum shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

Mr. J. H. BANKHEAD, of Alabama, having made a point of order, the Chairman held:

"The Chair has no doubt that this appropriation is in continuation of a public work already begun and is not subject to a point of order."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Has the Chairman nothing to say about the $25,000 to be immediately available?

Mr. BURLESON. That is clearly in order. The Chair will recall that, under the rules, the Committee on Appropriations has exclusive jurisdiction over deficiencies.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky calls the attention of the Chair to the following language in the bill:

Of which so much thereof as may be necessary is authorized to be used for carrying suitable water mains across Rock Creek to replace those now carried over said creek, to be immediately available and remain available until expended, $25,000.

Why would not that come clearly under this ruling in Hinds' Precedents?—

An appropriation for repair of an existing Government road to a national cemetery, etc., is in order on a general appropriation bill as in continuance of a public work.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But, Mr. Chairman, there is already a bridge there. This is not a continuation of a bridge already there. It is proposed to tear down and build a new bridge. The same proposition would apply to schools—to tear down one school and build another. You can not do that. If there was no bridge there that would be a different proposition, but there is a bridge there, and it has just been so stated by the gentleman who is in charge of the bill.

Mr. BURLESON. Suppose the bridge were to break down?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is no use in supposing that when it has not done it. That is a different proposition. When we get to the broken-down bridge, then we will cross the gully.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. In connection with what has been propounded in the nature of an inquiry by the Chair to the gentleman from Kentucky, as part of the Chair's ruling, the Chair will only add that if it appears that there is a bridge of some type at the point where it is proposed to construct the bridge, as provided for in the paragraph, it is not a parliamentary question as to whether or not the paragraph would be in order. The committee might decide that a wider bridge or a new bridge was necessary for public use. It does not devolve on the Chair to pass upon this phase of the subject. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, take the remarks of the Chairman himself. I will have the stenographer read them to you——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question about a matter that is not strictly pertinent to this paragraph, but as all of page 29 seems to deal with the traction company it suggests a question. The gentleman perhaps knows that I live in a part of the city that has been denied transportation facilities for a long time, and from time to time we have had promises from the people who are responsible for that crime known as the Sixteenth Street herdic that there would be certain facilities granted to the people who live in that section. Now, I have once or twice this year been able to mount that extraordinary vehicle that in one respect at least bears a striking likeness to the wonderful one-horse shay. In all of its joints, in all of its wheels, and in all of its connections it has grown uniformly and hopelessly decrepit, and the one I was on one day went to pieces as Dr. Holmes's shay did, and I hope it will never be repaired. I have seen it stated in the papers from time to time that we should have better facilities for transportation in that region, but they do not come. I do not know which committee has jurisdiction over this matter, whether such matters are cared for by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] or the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], but I do hope that from one or the other of them we will have legislation that will either force an abandonment of the street or give us a decent service. Nothing now remains of the Sixteenth Street herdics but smell and noise.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that a bill reaching the matter the gentleman from Texas desires has already passed this House, been signed by the President, and has become a law.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But we can not ride the law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There have been some indulgences granted by the Commissioners of the District, but I am reliably informed that the new herdics will go on service the 22d day of February.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is that in celebration of the memory of the man who never told a lie? [Laughter.] I will have to accept that statement.

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to recur to line 17, on page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] asks unanimous consent to recur to line 17, page 2.

Mr. REDFIELD. I move——

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Could we find out the purpose of the gentleman's request?

Mr. REDFIELD. The purpose of this motion is to restore the item of $1,450, reduced by an oversight to $1,300, to its present amount of $1,450, for this reason: The purchasing agent of the District of Columbia, pursuant to the report of a committee of which I was a member, has let go one clerk entirely and has either let a second clerk go or is about so to do. In so doing he threw a large amount of additional work upon this particular man, and I told him I believed Congress would be sufficiently fair, when this man had assumed the work of two others, or substantially so, to recognize his willingness to do that by increasing his salary to $1,450. This was stricken out on a point of order in my absence. I called the attention of the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations to that, and also the chairman of the District Committee. I think it is clearly a case of justice to a hard-working employee, and the District will be something like $1,500 to the good on the transaction. My amendment is to restore the figures $1,450 which were stricken out.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. You are asking unanimous consent to revert to this paragraph?

Mr. REDFIELD. I am.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Do I understand from the gentleman from New York he only asks this in one particular case and for one particular salary, or does he intend to allow others to go back and convince the jury or committee that many of these salaries which were increased were increased because they were deserved, but which also went out on points of order?

Mr. REDFIELD. No; this was the one case.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Then I shall have to object.

Mr. REDFIELD. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I will withhold it.

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, in regard to this one single case, as a member of the committee on the purchasing methods of the District of Columbia, whose report has been filed, and where I did a considerable portion of the work, I frankly told the purchasing agent that his office was, to my mind, run at too large an expense for the clerical force and I told him he ought to reduce that force. Pursuant to the suggestion he did let one man go entirely. I told him he still should reduce his force, and pursuant again to the suggestion he either let the second man go or is about so to do. Now, this work that two men did was good work and it had to be done, and it is now thrown upon the one man to my personal knowledge; and, speaking not from what I am told but from what I know, the work which two men did before, now put upon the shoulders of one man, is loyally and faithfully undertaken.

There is no case of the kind to my knowledge in the bill anywhere. I think it is only an act of common, ordinary justice to let this man have this trifling amount, when the District stands a gainer by 15 times the sum because of this arrangement.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I quite understand, and have no doubt that this clerk should have been promoted, else I would not, as a member of the subcommittee in charge of the bill, have voted and advocated his promotion. But to my personal knowledge there is not an increase advocated by the committee in this bill that is not a just and proper increase; and I can not subscribe to going back in the case of one individual and giving him a promotion at the request of any of my fellow members unless they agree that we go back to them all and try to convince the committee of the merits of their promotion. And for that reason I insist upon my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] objects, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, is authorized and directed to transfer to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia the land under his jurisdiction in square 1194 which is necessary, in the judgment of said commissioners, for the construction of the aforesaid bridge and approaches.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order to that paragraph. It is another attempt to give away the public domain.

Mr. BURLESON. What part does the gentleman mean?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. On top of page 31 there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] makes a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. BURLESON. I will state to the Chairman that this land is necessary as an abutment upon which one end of the bridge is to rest. It is owned by the Government; and it is necessary, as I understand it, to raise the western end of the bridge upon this property.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BURLESON. Before the Clerk proceeds to read, I ask unanimous consent that that particular paragraph may be passed in order that we may prepare an amendment to see if we can not meet the objection made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. With the point of order pending, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] desires that the ruling as made by the Chair be revoked and remain pending?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to lose my right to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Against the amendment the gentleman may offer at the time?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; nor against this.

Mr. BURLESON. As I understand it, you will have the right to make a point of order against any amendment I may offer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that any amendment which the gentleman from Texas may propose at the time would be new matter, and subject to a point of order or the reservation of a point of order. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, on page 31, following line 6, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter whenever, under appropriations made by Congress, the roadway of any street, avenue, or road in the District of Columbia is improved by laying a new pavement thereon or by resurfacing an existing pavement from curb to curb or from gutter to gutter, where the material used is sheet asphalt, asphalt block, asphaltic or bituminous macadam, concrete, or other fixed roadway pavement, such proportion of the total cost of the work, including the expenses of the assessment, to be made as hereinafter prescribed, shall be charged against and become a lien upon the abutting property, and assessments therefor shall be levied pro rata according to the linear frontage of said property on the street, avenue, or road or portion thereof upon the roadway of which said new pavement is laid or the existing roadway of which is resurfaced: Provided, however, That there shall be excepted from such assessment the cost of paving or resurfacing the roadway space included within the intersections of streets, avenues, and roads, as said intersections are included within building lines projected, and also the cost of paving the space within such roadways for which street railway companies are responsible under their charters or under law on streets, avenues, or roads where such railways have been or shall be constructed.

The assessments hereinbefore provided for shall be levied in the following manner, viz: Where the average width of roadway is 32 feet or less between curbs, or between gutters where no curb exists, one-half the total cost of the work, including the expenses of the assessment, shall be assessed as hereinbefore provided; where the average width of roadway is greater than 32 feet between curbs, or between gutters where no curb exists, one-half of the proportion of the total cost of the work which the width of 32 feet bears to the total width of the roadway between curbs, or between gutters where no curbs exist, together with one-fourth of the proportion of the total cost of the work which the balance of the roadway width in excess of 32 feet bears to the total width of the roadway, including the expenses of the total assessment, shall be assessed as hereinbefore provided.

Assessments levied under the provisions hereof shall be payable and collectible in the same manner and under the same penalty for nonpayment as is provided for assessments for improving sidewalks and alleys in the District of Columbia, as set forth on page 248 of volume 28, United States Statutes at Large: Provided, That the cost of publication of the notice of such assessment upon the failure to obtain personal service upon the owner of the property to be assessed therein provided for, and of the services of such notices, shall be paid out of the appropriation for the work, and such assessments when collected shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the United States and the District of Columbia in equal parts.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I will state that the committee would have made a report of this paragraph, but we were afraid a point of order might be made against it. I am free to say that I have not examined it with that care which I would have given it if I had thought it was going into the bill. It is a matter of great importance, and I am perfectly willing that it should be considered on its merits.

I now move that the committee do rise.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of inserting a short address made by my colleague from Mississippi [Mr. WITHERSPOON] before the Society of Sons of the American Revolution on Wednesday, January 15, 1913.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by publishing the address as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BORLAND. The chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], had begun the debate on this amendment, and then he moved that the committee rise. Does that give me an opportunity to debate the question when the committee sits again?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state for the information of the gentleman that the amendment offered by him will be considered as a new paragraph and as having been read by the Clerk, and pending, with no further proceedings taken.

Mr. BORLAND. Well, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] had made some formal debate of the matter, and then moved that the committee rise. My question is, Do I have an opportunity to resume the debate when the committee sits again?

Mr. BURLESON. No point of order has been made.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no rule that now occurs to the Chair that would interrupt the ordinary procedure of debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BORLAND. No point of order having been made upon it, the matter is open for debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that if no point of order has been made, it is now too late to make a point of order.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RODDENBERY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 28499) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

OFFICERS ON THE ACTIVE LIST OF THE ARMY.

Mr. HAY. Mr Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to call up House resolution 790. It is a privileged resolution, asking for certain information from the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution (H. Res. 790) calling on Secretary of War for information.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to submit to the House of Representatives at the earliest practicable date a statement showing, in the case of each officer on the active list of the Army with rank above that of colonel, the following items of information, to wit:

First. Total length of service as a commissioned officer of the Army.

Second. Length of service as a commissioned officer of the line of the Army in each grade from second lieutenant to colonel, both grades inclusive; also the total length of such service in all of said grades.

Third. Length of time actually on duty with troops, as a commissioned officer of the line of the Army, in each grade from second lieutenant to colonel, both grades inclusive; also the total length of such duty in all of said grades.

Fourth. Length of service as a commissioned officer of a staff corps or department, or of a bureau or office of the War Department, in each grade below that of brigadier general; also the total length of such service in all of said grades.

Fifth. Length of service as a general officer, or as chief of a staff corps or department of the Army, or as a chief of a bureau or office of the War Department, with the rank of a general officer.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, is that a request for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. No; it is a privileged matter.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] if it has a unanimous report from the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. HAY. It has.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HAY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF INDIANS OCCUPYING RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up Senate bill 5674, for the relief of Indians occupying railroad lands, and ask unanimous consent that the House insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 5674) for the relief of Indians occupying railroad lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent that the House insist on its amendments to this bill and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, Mr. HAYDEN, and Mr. BURKE of South Dakota.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 157. Joint resolution to enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay the necessary expenses of the inaugural ceremonies of the President of the United States on March 4, 1913.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. CRAVENS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 24194. To create a new division of the western judicial district of Texas and to provide for terms of court at Pecos, Tex., and for other purposes; and

H. R. 18841. Incorporating the National Institute of Arts and Letters.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from further consideration of House Document No. 1317, and the same was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that to-morrow, immediately after the approval of the Journal, I shall move to proceed with the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill. I now ask unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of that bill immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] asks unanimous consent that immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow the House shall resolve itself automatically into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] who has made the request if he has consulted the minority leader, Mr. MANN, in relation to it?

Mr. BURLESON. I have not; but I feel quite sure that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] appreciates the importance of getting on with the appropriation bills.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The same request could be made when the House meets to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Let me suggest to my friend that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was here yesterday when the same thing was done, although to-day would have been private-bill day under the rule. To-morrow it will be different, because this bill will be in order in due course.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I will ask the gentleman what time he will expect the committee to rise to-morrow evening, to-morrow being Saturday?

Mr. BURLESON. At the usual hour.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. What hour is that?

Mr. BURLESON. Somewhere in the neighborhood of 5 o'clock.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. With the understanding that the committee will rise at the usual hour, I will offer no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS BY POPULAR VOTE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the secretary of state of Oregon, announcing the ratification by the legislature of that State of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire if it is true that unanimous consent has been given during the day for a print of the Senate amendments to House bill 22871?

The SPEAKER. Yes; that consent was given.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE LEGARE.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to announce to the House of Representatives the death of Hon. GEORGE S. LEGARE, a Representative from the State of South Carolina. I shall not take the time of the House now, but on some future occasion we shall ask the House to pay proper tribute to his memory. I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 804.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. GEORGE S. LEGARE, a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expense in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask unanimous consent to have that resolution amended by providing for a committee of 16 Members instead of 15. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to; and the Speaker announced as the committee on the part of the House Messrs. DAVIDSON, LOUD, WILSON of Illinois, ANDRUS, YOUNG of Kansas, FINLEY, ELLERBE, JOHNSON of South Carolina, BYRNES of South Carolina, AIKEN of South Carolina, LEVER, HAMLIN, MCLAUGHLIN, BROUSSARD, REILLY, and BOOHER.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to report the last resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the House, under the order heretofore adopted, adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, February 1, 1913, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Savannah River at Augusta, Ga., with a view to determining what improvements are necessary in the interest of navigation by way of enlarging and extending the project authorized by the river and harbor act of June 25, 1910 (H. Doc. No. 1319); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Lake Crescent and Dunns Creek, Fla., from the St. Johns River to Crescent City (H. Doc. No. 1320); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, laying before Congress facts regarding cost of building at the port of Boston authorized by act of February 23, 1909, and suggesting legislation increasing limit of cost of same (H. Doc. No. 1322); to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the president of the Capital Traction Co., transmitting annual report of said company for the year ending December 31, 1912 (H. Doc. No. 1321); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting part 2 of the annual report of the Commissioner of Lighthouses for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1912 (H. Doc. No. 1323); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. LAMB, from the Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred the bill (S. 6497) to protect migratory game and insectivorous birds in the United States, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1424), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAUGEN, from the Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 27279) to amend the second clause of section 4 of chapter 784 of the United States Statutes at Large, volume 32, page 195, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1427), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TUTTLE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 778) directing the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to institute and carry forward an investigation into the letting of contracts, etc., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1426), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. ROTHERMEL, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor, submitted a report (No. 1425), together with the views of the minority, on the ful-seal industry of Alaska, which report was referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 26849) for the relief of Charles Dudley Daly, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1428), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. STEPHENS of Texas: A bill (H. R. 28558) to regulate the sale or other disposition by Indians of property issued to them by the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. CRAGO: A bill (H. R. 28559) for the relief of the nurses who served in the War with Spain; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. COVINGTON: A bill (H. R. 28560) for the purchase of a site and erection of a Federal building at Cambridge, Md.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. LEWIS: A bill (H. R. 28561) to amend an act entitled "An act to require the erection of fire escapes in certain buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 19, 1906, as amended by the act approved March 2, 1907; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. FERRIS: Resolution (H. Res. 802) requesting the President of the United States to furnish the House of Representatives with all the affidavits, charges, corroborating evidence, letters, and other official documents in the case of Willard N. Jones; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SIMS: Resolution (H. Res. 803) to nonconcur in gross in Senate amendments to H. R. 19115; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. LAFFERTY: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, urging the calling of a convention to propose a constitutional amendment prohibiting polygamy in the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, favoring the passage of a Federal law for the protection of migratory birds; to the Committee on Agriculture.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 28562) granting an increase of pension to Wilson S. Thorp; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CULLOP: A bill (H. R. 28563) granting an increase of pension to Francis M. Neal; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FERGUSSON: A bill (H. R. 28564) granting a pension to Thomas F. Lancaster; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HEALD: A bill (H. R. 28565) granting a pension to Wilhelmina Widdoes; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HENSLEY: A bill (H. R. 28566) for the relief of the heirs of Sarah B. Matthews and Elijah B. Matthews, deceased; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 28567) granting an increase of pension to John Drobel; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WEEKS: Petition of the young men's department, Congregational Church, Newton, Mass., favoring the passage of the Kenyon-Sheppard bill to prevent the shipping of liquors into dry territories; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 1, 1913.

(Continuation of legislative day of Thursday, January 30, 1913.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock and 45 minutes a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. GALLINGER). Under the order of the Senate of January 24, 1901, the Chair announces the appointment of the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] to read Washington's Farewell Address on February 22, 1913.

REPORT OF INTERURBAN RAILWAY CO. (H. DOC. NO. 1328).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual report of the Interurban Railway Co. for the year ending December 31, 1912, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

ELECTORS FOR PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting, pursuant to law, an authenticated copy of the certificate of the final ascertainment of electors for President and Vice President appointed in the State of South Carolina at the election held in that State November 5, 1912, which was ordered to be filed.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I suggest the want of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois suggests the absence of a quorum, and the roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cummins	Lodge	Shively
Bourne	Curtis	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Dixon	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Bristow	du Pont	Martine, N. J.	Smoot
Brown	Gallinger	Myers	Stephenson
Bryan	Gronna	Nelson	Sutherland
Burnham	Guggenheim	Page	Swanson
Burton	Hitchcock	Paynter	Thomas
Chilton	Jackson	Percy	Thornton
Clark, Wyo.	Jones	Perkins	Townsend
Crawford	Kavanaugh	Perky	Wetmore
Culberson	Kenyon	Richardson	Williams
Cullom	La Follette	Sanders	Works

Mr. JONES. I desire to state that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. GAMBLE], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BRADLEY], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. JOHNSTON] are absent at a meeting of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. THORNTON. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FOSTER] on account of illness in his family, and also that he is paired with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 5674) for the relief of Indians occupying railroad lands disagreed to by the Senate; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, Mr. HAYDEN, and Mr. BURKE of South Dakota managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 157) to enable the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay the necessary expenses of the inaugural ceremonies of the President of the United States on March 4, 1913, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I present the credentials of WILLARD SAULSBURY, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Delaware a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1913, which I ask may be read, and there is accompanying it a letter from the secretary of state of the State of Delaware which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

The credentials of WILLARD SAULSBURY, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Delaware a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1913, were read and ordered to be filed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware asks that a letter from the secretary of state of the State of Delaware, relating to the credentials of the Senator elect, be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The letter referred to is as follows:

STATE OF DELAWARE,
OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
Dover, Del., January 31, 1913.

SECRETARY OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I herewith inclose the certificate of election of WILLARD SAULSBURY to the United States Senate as a Senator from Delaware for the constitutional term beginning March 4, 1913.

For your information, and in accordance with section 2, Rule VI, of the standing rules of the Senate, I herewith hand you the following information in connection with this election:

Name, WILLARD SAULSBURY.
Date of certificate, January 29, 1913.
Governor (signing certificate), Charles R. Miller.
Secretary of state (signing certificate), Thomas W. Miller.
State from which Senator is elected, Delaware.
Vote given at election: WILLARD SAULSBURY, 28; HARRY A. RICHARDSON, 11; John G. Townsend, jr., 5; Alfred I. du Pont, 3; Ruby R. Vale, 1; Alexander P. Corbit, 1; Simeon S. Pennewill, 1; necessary to choice, 26.

Very truly, yours,

THOMAS W. MILLER,
Secretary of State.

SENATOR FROM SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. GAMBLE. I present the credentials of THOMAS STERLING, chosen by the Legislature of the State of South Dakota a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1913, which I ask may be read and placed on file.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the credentials.

The credentials of THOMAS STERLING, chosen by the Legislature of the State of South Dakota a Senator from that State, for the term beginning March 4, 1913, were read and ordered to be filed.

INTERSTATE SHIPMENT OF LIQUOR.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document a brief on the so-called Kenyon interstate liquor-shipment bill.

Mr. LODGE. I regret to do it, but I must make the same point of order that I made previously. Under the unanimous-consent agreement no other business is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts makes the point of order that under the unanimous-consent agreement no routine business can be transacted. The point of order is sustained. Senate joint resolution No. 78 is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

THE PRESIDENTIAL TERM.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, with respect to the phase of the matter that I was discussing last evening I desire only to say further that I believe every constitution should contain a provision that a proposed amendment to the Constitution initiated by the legislative branch of the Government and failing to meet the approval of that branch of the Government should be submitted to the people for their approval or disapproval upon a fair and reasonable proportion of the people indicating their desire for such submission. I think that is a proposition upon which those who believe in the referendum will agree.

Our Constitution has no such provision. Our forefathers intended that it should be difficult to amend the Constitution. I believe that there ought to be such opportunities for reflection and consideration as would always prevent hasty or ill-advised action; but in view of the development of the science of government and of the sociology of the present day I think it has become the duty of Congress to submit proposed amendments to the people whenever Congress is made to understand that a fair and reasonable proportion of the people to be affected desire such an amendment to be submitted to them. It will become more and more, it seems to me, our duty to construe the Constitution in this way.

What I said yesterday was simply to make it clear that there had been from the beginning of the Government a continuous, persistent demand for this amendment to our organic law. That demand has found expression in the declaration of political parties. It has found expression in the action of many States.

It has found expression in the declaration of an illustrious line of patriots and statesmen from the beginning until now. I think that we can well accept this evidence of the desire of the people to be permitted to determine for themselves what their government shall be in the stead of that definite petition which modern constitution makers have inserted in modern constitutions.

I now pass for a very few minutes to discuss the merits of the proposal. In doing so I am acting not as a Senator in the Congress of the United States. I am not speaking now as a Senator; I am speaking as one of an hundred millions of people, all of whom are to be affected by the amendment if it becomes a part of the Constitution. I am considering it precisely as though all the voters of the United States were assembled and we were trying to determine for ourselves whether it is wise or unwise to prescribe this rule for the conduct of our public business.

I assume that there is no Senator who will declare that the people, the source of all power, ought not to prescribe rules for their own government. I know that there is a tendency in these later days to disparage the rules which are intended to prevent the people from doing at any particular time and in any way in which they desire to do it whatsoever they at that moment may want to do—that is to say, what a majority of them may want to do—but I can not think that that view has found approval among the thinking men of the country, and especially has it not found approval in the Senate of the United States.

This is a Government of law; it is a Government of constitutions; and it is absolutely necessary, as I think every Senator here will agree, that the people shall in their primary capacity prescribe rules not only for the restraint of their representatives but for their own restraint as well.

Let us take some of the examples of these restraints. I do not say that all of them are wise; I only instance them in order that we may have the subject well in mind. The Constitution of the United States declares that no man shall be elected President of the country unless he be 35 years of age. The people in that have restrained themselves from selecting a man for President who has not attained the age of 35 years. It is a limitation, a restriction upon their powers and privileges, of which we have heard so much.

Again, the Constitution declares that the person chosen for President must be a natural-born citizen. No matter how long he may have been a citizen of the United States, no matter how early in his life he may have come into the United States, the people have no right under the Constitution to elect any man President unless he was born a citizen of the United States. Whether this is a wise or an unwise restraint I do not say. I only mention it in order to indicate that always the people have recognized that they must prescribe rules for their Government that will bind themselves as well as their representatives.

Again, the Constitution says that no man shall be elected a Senator in the Congress of the United States unless he is 30 years of age, unless he has been nine years a citizen of the United States, and unless he be at the time he is elected an inhabitant of the State from which he comes.

A State might very much desire at the moment to select a man who had not been a citizen of the United States for nine years; it might desire to select a man who was not an inhabitant of the State; and yet they have put this restraint upon themselves, because at the time the Constitution was adopted it was believed that on the whole the country would be better served if these persons excluded by the Constitution are not permitted to hold this particular office.

It is likewise true of Representatives in Congress. A man to hold that office must be 25 years of age, and must have been a citizen of the United States for seven years before his election, and must have been an inhabitant of the State from which he comes.

These are simply illustrations of the restraints which the people have hitherto put upon themselves with regard to the selection of a President, a Senator, and a Representative.

Again, it is in the power of the House of Representatives to impeach and in the power of the Senate to try and convict. The Constitution says that one of the penalties imposed after a conviction in an impeachment proceeding may be disqualification for any office under the laws of the United States. Therefore, if a President were impeached and the Senate of the United States had attached this disqualification to him, no matter how much the people of the country might desire after that time to elect him President or to elect him Senator or to elect him Representative, they would be incapable of doing it, because the framers of the Constitution believed it would be better for the country and that the calm counsel of a deliberative body in establishing rules would furnish better protection than the act of the immediate time.

But that is not all. Our Constitution puts many restraints upon the people in a legislative way. Suppose that we had introduced into the United States the system of direct legislation. I will not discuss the practicability or the merits of that system at this time, but suppose it had been established. We would be met with these restraints upon the power of the people:

> No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed.

Does any Senator here believe that it is not wise for the people to say to themselves in the deliberation of a constitutional convention or assemblage that we shall not pass a bill of attainder or ex post facto law?

Or, again, that—

> No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken.

That is a restraint upon the people, indirect now because it is a restraint upon their Representatives in Congress, but it would be direct if we had the system of direct legislation.

And again, passing to another section:

> No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or grant any title of nobility.

A State, if it had the system of direct legislation as many States now have, might think it very desirable at a particular time to pass a law that would impair the obligation of a contract. The people of the State might feel the injustice of a particular obligation so keenly that they would be willing to pass a law that would impair the obligation of the contract in which the debt or obligation was created.

Is there, however, anyone who feels that it is an invasion of the powers and the privileges of the people if they themselves declare as a rule of their own conduct that they will not pass any law which violates the obligation of a contract or pass any law which makes a thing criminal that before that time was not criminal, and makes an act committed before that time a criminal act that was innocent at the time it was performed?

I simply mention these things in order to show that we may go far afield if we attempt to fashion our conduct upon the hypothesis or upon the proposition that the people in making their laws and in making their constitutions ought not to put any restraint upon themselves.

It is not a wise and sound principle of government that the majority of the people have a right to do at a given time anything that a majority at the moment desire to do. There is no government in the world that could survive for a decade the establishment of a principle of that kind.

Therefore, without going further into the philosophic doctrine itself, or the abstract doctrine, I come to consider whether it is wise for the people to say to themselves, "We will not elect a man President of the United States who has held that office"; in other words, that we will establish the system of a single term for President of the United States.

Now, I recognize that there may be a great difference of opinion upon the merits of this proposition. I take great pleasure in acknowledging my own belief that those who oppose it are entirely sincere and that they oppose it because they believe that it is not wise to so restrict the action of the people. I grant you that there is no other tribunal so trustworthy in the election of a President as the tribunal of the people. I have implicit faith, the highest confidence, in their patriotism, in their intelligence, in their desire to render complete justice among themselves; but I have no higher confidence in the ability of the people to select a President of the United States than I have in their ability to declare, when the question is submitted to them, whether they desire that, under any circumstances, one who has held the office shall again hold the office. I think that the highest privilege, the dearest power that the people of this country can exercise is the power to say for themselves what their Constitution shall be, by what rule they will be governed in the future. Therefore, in appealing for the passage of this joint resolution, I am opening the door to the exercise of that highest and most sacred right which any free people can either enjoy or exercise. If we wait until two-thirds of the Senators and two-thirds of the House of Representatives are individually convinced that this rule ought to obtain before we give the people the opportunity to declare upon it themselves we will wait either until the millenium or we will wait until the pressure of public opinion upon Senators and Representatives leaves them no other course to pursue save the submission of the amendment.

Let us see now for a moment the point we have reached in the argument. The people want a President who will render them the best possible service; they want a President who will be a faithful, efficient public servant. I will endeavor to state the argument on the other side, and if I do not state it fairly I want some one who is opposed to the joint resolution to correct me. It is said that a President will more faithfully and more efficiently execute his duties if he executes them with a view to a renomination by the party to which he belongs and a reelection by the people; that the stimulus of this popular approval will lead him to a better and more complete performance of the duties with which he is charged than if he knew that there could be for him no renomination and no reelection. I do not believe in that proposition. I believe that the President of the United States will more faithfully execute his duties under the proposed limitation. I am not now speaking of the President as a leader of a party, because we do not elect Presidents as leaders of parties or as leaders of the people. Presidents may be leaders of the party to which they belong; they may be leaders of public thought; but they are not elected either to be leaders of parties or leaders of public thought. They are elected to perform certain duties imposed upon them by the Constitution and by the laws which have been enacted by the Congress of the United States.

I do not want it to be understood that I think a President ought to efface himself from political affairs; that he ought not to occupy his abilities and to employ his experience in the general service of the people; but if he has those abilities and if he has that experience, he will be a leader of men, not because he has the power of a President, but because he has the power of character and capacity. I am not considering that phase of the activities of a man who happens for the time being to be a President of the United States. I am considering only those duties which he has sworn to perform which the Constitution places upon him and which the Congress of the United States have required should be performed.

I think that a President of the United States will more perfectly keep an eye single to the work which he has undertaken to do if he is not disturbed, if he is not vexed, if he is not influenced by the thought of renomination or reelection.

Very much has been said in praise of the Presidents of the United States from the beginning until now. I join in it all, and would emphasize if I could. The United States has been conspicuously fortunate in the character and attainments of the men who have been elevated to the high office of President; but, nevertheless, I am bound to say that it is my belief that every President of the United States, save one—and he is only a possible exception, but I do make one exception—that every President of the United States save one, no matter how good a President he was, would have been a better President if he had been ineligible to renomination and reelection. The exception that I make in my own mind is George Washington; and I make it only because I believe that he was indifferent—wholly indifferent—with respect to his renomination and reelection.

Mark you, I am not taking away any of the just praise which ought to be accorded to all these illustrious men when I say that the ambition for renomination and reelection disturbed their serenity when they ought to have been most serene, impaired their efficiency when they ought to have been most efficient, because so long as the Constitution remains as it is, so long as the incumbent of the presidential office is eligible for renomination and reelection, he must be a candidate for it, for it is the renomination and the reelection that constitute the approval of what he has done, and failure to renominate and reelect is a disapproval of what he has done. Therefore, in the first place, a President is bound to devote a very considerable part of his time to the mere work of securing a renomination and the mere participation in a campaign for reelection.

The duties of the presidential office are growing in importance with every day; the power of the President has immeasurably increased in the last quarter of a century; and so long as you put before the President the view that he must be renominated and reelected in order not to be disgraced he will devote, he ought to devote, a large part of his time that should be wholly employed in the public service to the manipulation and the organization necessary to bring about a renomination and reelection. No man can escape from that temptation. If we could bring candidates from the heavenly regions, with all the exemptions which they have from mortal weakness, they could not escape the temptation which I have pointed out.

Now, it will be said, I know, that that temptation is the very thing that leads Presidents to a faithful performance of their duties. I do not think so. I am not saying, mark you, that the people are not competent to reject a President who has not been efficient and faithful. The history of the country is full of instances in which such Presidents have been rejected. That is not the point that I am trying to make. The point that I am making is the effect upon the administration of the office itself and the weakness that it injects into the work which the President must necessarily do. It makes no difference whether the people reject him or not, his work has been neglected and illy done; and for that wrong, for that misfortune, there is no remedy whatsoever. I believe that a President will more faithfully perform his duty if no influence can approach him from any quarter touching a renomination or a reelection.

What are the duties of a President? They are, first, to execute the Constitution and the laws of the United States; and they ought to be executed without fear, without favor, without influence. They ought to be executed against the rich and the poor alike; they ought to be executed against the great and the small alike; they ought to be executed against the famous and the obscure alike. We have a great variety of laws; some of them are popular and some of them are unpopular; some of them are popular with a certain portion of the community and unpopular with another portion of the community. Those laws will increase in number and they will multiply in importance. What we desire, what we ought to have, is a condition in which the President of the United States will move forward to the execution of these laws blind to personality, blind to influence, blind to the position of those who are to be affected by the enforcement of the statutes. Take, for instance, the statute which I think is the most important of all the legislation of Congress, a statute that vitally affects, I think, the integrity and the permanency of our institutions, a statute which will grow with every day. I mean the statute directed against contracts, combinations, and conspiracies in restraint of trade and commerce. I think that this law—I mention it as one of many—will be more faithfully administered, more energetically applied without respect to persons or conditions, if the President of the United States is free from the influences which these great powers can exert.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. That is one of the strong reasons, to my mind, why this proposed constitutional amendment should not be adopted. The influences which exert themselves against the execution of this law would still operate directly upon the President, but the influence which demands the enforcement of this law, the public sentiment of the people of the United States, will be taken away and entirely destroyed. I think it is well to have in operation public sentiment as well as private interests.

Mr. CUMMINS. It makes no matter, Mr. President, as I said a few moments ago, if the people condemn the action of the President; the action has been had, the wrong has been inflicted. I am endeavoring to support this proposal upon the belief on my own part that it is not so likely that neglect will occur and inefficiency will intervene and partiality be exercised if the President is free from all these influences. I can not think a man whom the people of the United States elect as President of the United States, and therefore a man of high character, therefore a man of great ability, therefore a man of wide and generous experience—I can not think that he is as likely to abandon his duty because he has no hope of reelection as he will be to abandon it under the influence of those who are interested either for or against the administration of the law, when that influence reaches or affects renomination and reelection.

If the people could see everything that is done, could know just why everything is done, and could penetrate the hidden recesses of the presidential thought, that might be so, and part of my objection might disappear, but the people can not understand everything that takes place in the administration of law. The neglect, the inefficiency must be marked and long-continued before it will be or can be condemned by the great mass of the people.

I think, Mr. President, that this proposal, if carried into the Constitution, will work for the highest welfare of the people of this country. I believe as firmly as I can believe anything that these insidious influences, presented under the most extraordinary circumstances—I do not mean, of course, that a President of the United States would deliberately bargain away his integrity and his manhood; but the thought I have in mind is this: The President wants to be renominated and reelected; a man approaches him in order to influence, as he may think very properly, his conduct in the administration of the law; the President know that this man holds high position in the community in which he lives and is capable of exercising great influence upon the thought and action of his fellow men; the President knows also that if he is not renominated and reelected the rejection will be the equivalent of a condemnation of his Presidency—there is no mortal man who will not be moved by that influence. He may be unconscious of it; he may insensibly take on the opinion that seems to him the one best adapted for his renomination and reelection, but it is not within human nature to wholly reject the influence.

Mr. BORAH. Will it interrupt the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. BORAH. If this is a legitimate argument—and the Senator is presenting it with great effect—suppose we take this illustration: The Senator has referred to the enforcement of the Sherman law. Let us assume that some powerful interest is opposed to the enforcement of the Sherman law and representatives of that interest visit the President; they present their view of it, and more insidious influences operate than the insidious influence of reelection; and suppose those insidious influences have their effect. The counterbalancing influence is the public demand that that law shall be enforced. I sincerely think that when you take away the counterbalancing influence, the public demand, and remove the President from the touch of the public influence, you leave him to deal alone with the private interests which may operate in this insidious and subtle way with a President of the United States, if we are to assume that the argument is legitimate at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have assumed that it is legitimate, because it seems to me to bear directly upon the merits of the matter.

Mr. BORAH. I did not mean to say that it is not; but if it is an argument to be taken into consideration that a President can be affected by these influences, then there are two influences operating one against the other—the one represented by the public demand, the other represented by the private interests operating in a subtle and secret way.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President; I do not look upon the equation from that point of view. I assume, now, that the President is an honest man. I assume that the people have acted with intelligence in selecting him as President. I am assuming that he intends to remain honest during the course of his administration. I am assuming that he desires faithfully to execute the law as he understands the law and as he recognizes his duty. I do not think any man who would probably be elected President of the United States would be deflected from the path of his duty by these influences unless they should be coupled up with a desire of his own—a desire to accomplish a thing which he would stand condemned before the American people if he did not accomplish.

I can not think we will install a President whose instinct is to do wrong. I believe the history of the country will sustain my assertion that our Presidents have been honest men and they have desired to do their duty. But the conflicting interests and conflicting emotions which must reside in the presidential mind or conscience when he must balance up his course in a particular matter with respect to its effect upon his political future I regard as a most flagrant weakness in our institutions.

I do not think he ought to be compelled to undergo the temptation. I think he ought to understand that when he reaches the Presidency he has attained the climax of human ambition, and that when he presides for a period of years over the fortunes of the greatest Nation on the face of the earth his ambition ought to be satisfied. So far as he is concerned, we will work no injury upon him by excluding him thereafter from the office. The only question is whether the people will have a President who will more faithfully perform the duties which have been imposed upon a President by Constitution and by law if he is free from the ambition to court any interest or any influence save the influence that grows out of an honest execution of his duties, or whether we ought to put him in the maelstrom of politics from the beginning to the end of his administration—put him where he must travel from one end of the country to the other, appealing to the people in precisely the same way as does a candidate for any other office.

I think the work of a President of the United States is sufficient to consume all his time. It is sufficient to demand all his strength. It ought to require his undivided and his persistent devotion. And even then it may grow too great for mortal man successfully to perform.

But you will observe I have not mentioned the matter of patronage. That does not affect me very much. I have not had much experience in patronage myself, and I care very little about it. I know that vast power grows out of its distribution. All I have to say about that part of the matter is that any President who attempts, either through the use of patronage, through its grant, or through its refusal, to influence any other department of the Government or any member of any other department of the Government, or who attempts to influence any man in the United States in his primary relations to the Government is not only utterly unfit for the office but falls under the specific condemnation of the Constitution of the United States.

I am not a believer in this notion that the President of the United States is the administration of which he is a part. I am not a believer in this modern sentiment that we elect Presidents of the United States to establish policies and to ordain the course which the Government should take during the time they may be in office. We do not elect Presidents for any such purpose. If the man elected President by his intrinsic or inherent worth is able to influence public opinion in a legitimate way, he has a perfect right to do it. But he has no right, moral or legal, to use any part of the power bestowed upon him by virtue of his election to influence anybody or to influence any event. He may recommend, according to his views, legislation which he thinks should be enacted. That is entirely within his constitutional privilege. He may inform Congress as to the state of public affairs. That is entirely within his privilege. But aside from these two things the President who performs the duties of his office, who administers the laws of his country with any view whatsoever to his own reelection, and who attempts to use the power of his office, either for that or for legislation, violates not only the ethics of good government but the Constitution of his country as well.

As great as the office is, as much power as it has, I think we have been in recent years assigning to it a place which it does not occupy in the framework of our Government, and we have been magnifying it in a way which will ultimately destroy the independence of Congress and make a President of the United States, whether for one term or for many terms, the practical dictator of our affairs.

That leads me to just one last remark. I have heard it said several times that when we establish the principle of a single term we overturn the work of the fathers, that we reverse a result which they reached deliberately and, of course, for a patriotic purpose. I have thought that those who have hitherto spoken upon that subject—I mean within the last day or two—have somewhat misapprehended the history of this controversy in the Federal convention which prepared and submitted to the people the National Constitution; and I intend to call attention, for just a moment, to what actually did happen there.

When this convention met, immediately after its organization, two plans of government were proposed, one by Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, another by Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina. Under the Randolph plan the President of the United States was to be elected by what he called the National Legislature—what we know as Congress—and was to be ineligible for reelection. In the Pinckney plan there was no provision as to the method of electing a President of the United States, and he was to be eligible for reelection. Hamilton's plan, which came a little later, provided for the election of a President by electors and that he should hold his office during good behavior.

A report of the committee of the whole house was made on June 19, 1787, and in that report, submitted to the convention as a convention, the Randolph idea was adopted. I need not go through all the debates that occurred between the submission of the plan and the report I have just mentioned.

By the report of that committee—the committee of the whole—to the convention the President was to be elected by the Congress, or National Legislature, and was not to be eligible for reelection. I only mention that to inquire further the reason given for the ineligibility. There was but one. It was reiterated a great many times and in a great many forms and varieties of phrase. When all is said, the reason was that the President of the United States should be independent; that he should not be subject to the influence of Congress; that he should be free to execute the laws of the country in the way that an upright conscience would demand. Therefore so long as the Federal convention held to the idea of electing a President by the National Legislature, so long it held to the idea that he must be ineligible for reelection.

I have now stated what occurred on the 19th of June, 1787. I may say, however, that the term during all this time was to be seven years. Finally, on the 26th of July, the resolutions of the convention which declared ineligibility were referred to a committee of detail, whose power was to look them over and again report. This committee was composed of Rutledge, Randolph, Gorham, Ellsworth, and Wilson. That committee reported on the 6th day of August, and it reported in favor of an election by the National Legislature and ineligibility for reelection. From that day until August 30 the subject was not considered. On August 30 those subjects which had been postponed were referred to a committee of 11, one from each State.

On September 4 this committee of 11 reported a modification of this article, reducing the term to four years, entirely changing the method of electing the President and saying nothing respecting ineligibility, being substantially the plan that was finally adopted in the Constitution—an election by electors chosen by the several States.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. LIPPITT. While the Senator is reviewing that part of the proceedings of the constitutional convention, I hope he will not fail to call to the attention of the Senate the fact that the question of ineligibility was closely related to the method by which the President was to be elected. So long as the President was to be elected by what was then called the National Legislature—what we now know as Congress—the members of the convention, as I remember, seemed to be very fixed in their determination to have the President ineligible for reelection. His relations with the National Legislature itself were to be so close that it was thought quite inadvisable that a President and a National Legislature should be in those relations to each other with regard to the reelection of the President that they were also in concerning the constant daily transaction of business.

One of the great reasons why that method of selecting the President was not decided upon was because, on mature consideration, the convention was opposed to making the President ineligible. One strong reason for finally selecting the present method of electing the President was to get over, as I remember, what they considered the inadvisability of making the President ineligible for another election.

I simply desire to call that view of the matter to the Senator's attention.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in most of what has just been said by the Senator from Rhode Island I agree, because it recites historical facts. I had already stated that the original plan presented by Mr. Randolph required the election by the National Legislature, and that the President was to be ineligible, because it was feared that there would not be sufficient independence of action upon his part, and it was desirable that the President should be independent in the conduct of the office. During the whole of the convention they were seeking for some plan for the election of a President of the United States that would make him independent, that would insure the execution of the law without fear or favor, on the part of the President, of anybody or toward anybody.

The Senator from Rhode Island is quite right in saying that the matter of ineligibility was closely connected with the method of electing a President; but after all the principle that was present in the minds of the members of the convention and the problem that they were seeking to solve was, How can we get a President of the United States who will be free of all influence in the performance of his duty? It was believed——

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield in just a moment. It was believed finally, when they had fallen upon the idea of electing a President, not by the National Legislature but by a body of electors chosen by the several States, that they had succeeded in discovering a plan that would make the President of the United States an independent branch of the Government of the United States.

I now yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. In discussing this question some time back I made a part of my remarks the proceedings of the Constitutional Convention, and it was shown by the proceedings that at one time during their deliberation a majority of the States voted in favor of the particular proposition that is now before the Senate, except that the term of office was fixed at seven years instead of six. To my mind it is perfectly evident that the outcome by which we have our present system was a compromise between the two extremes upon that question, which was discussed day after day and presented at various times. There was a conflict between the two extremes in respect to it, some of them going to the extent of desiring that it should be made a life tenure. It is perfectly evident to me, from a consideration of the proceedings themselves, that the present mode of selecting the President and his term of office was a compromise that was not really satisfactory to either branch of that convention.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BORAH. The vote which was taken by the several States in favor of the proposition as it is now proposed was taken at the time when they still had before them the proposition of electing the President by Congress. Never after the proposition of electing by the electoral vote was agreed upon was there any considerable support in the convention for the ineligibility of the President.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with the statement of the Senator from Idaho. First, let me say that the work of the convention went to the committee of 11, with the provision that the President was to be elected by the National Legislature for seven years and that he was to be ineligible. That is the way it went to the committee. But when the report came in from the committee—and this was very near the close of the convention—the Randolph provision had been stricken out and the plan of electing by electors had been adopted and the term reduced to four years, without saying anything whatever as to eligibility or ineligibility. After that time there was practically no discussion of the subject and little division.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WORKS. There was no practical discussion of that question, because that occurred right at the close of the convention.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; within a very few days of the close.

Mr. WORKS. And as a matter of fact it received very little consideration, as far as the record shows.

Mr. CUMMINS. Hardly any.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. LIPPITT. I do not want to inject myself unduly into the very careful speech which the Senator from Iowa is making on this question, but the statement has just been made that the final decision which was reached by the Constitutional Convention was a compromise. I have in the course of considering this question examined the proceedings of that convention with considerable care, and I can not agree to the statement that the final result was in any degree a compromise.

To my mind it was not only not a compromise, but after the most mature deliberation of this question, after taking vote after vote upon it, and after considering it from every different standpoint, because the questions of the duration of the term, of eligibility, and of the method of election were all inextricably mixed up with each other—I say, after considering all these relations with the greatest care the final result was a victory, complete, final, and decisive for the method of election which we now have in force. The original idea was that the term of the President should be seven years, that he should be ineligible, and that he should be elected by the National Legislature. The final result of the discussion, which was very elaborate and during which there were votes taken upon many methods, was the adoption of the present method. This was the opposite extreme of the method first proposed.

Therefore I fail to see where there was any element of compromise in it or where there was anything but evidence of entire conviction after the most mature deliberation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the personal equation entered into this matter very much, though of course it could not be discussed before the convention. George Washington presided over that convention. Everybody knew that he was going to be the first President of the United States. Everybody knew that he was the only man in America in whom all Americans had absolute confidence as to his integrity and his wisdom, especially his integrity, and his patriotism. That seems to me to have been the case, reading more between the lines than in the discussion itself, because that matter could not have been discussed out loud in the convention, but men talked to one another about it. It will be remembered that the school which followed Mr. Jefferson was in favor of seven years at first, with ineligibility forever afterwards, and he expresses why they changed their desire in a letter a part of the language of which, with the permission of the Senator from Iowa I will read. This is what he said when he gave up this idea, and wrote to his friends to give it up. It had been put in the Constitution as it is, and the point was as to whether they should insist upon that as one of the amendments conditional to the ratification of the Constitution. He writes:

Indeed, since the thing is established—

That is, this four years term, with indefinite reeligibility—

Indeed, since the thing is established I would wish it not to be altered during the life of our great leader—

Referring to Washington—

whose executive talents are superior to those, I believe, of any man in the world, and who, alone, by the authority of his name and the confidence reposed in his perfect integrity, is fully qualified to put the new Government so under way as to secure it against the efforts of opposition. But having derived from our error all the good there is in it I hope we shall correct it the moment we can no longer have the same name at the helm.

I think that thought running through the minds of very many accounts for the fact that although a majority of that convention at one time desired to put ineligibility into the Constitution after a fixed term, they finally took the position which they did take. Very many people were of the opinion that, except for George Washington being President and being reeligible as long as the Nation needed him at that time, we could not get our institutions out of the wet mold and get them dry set, as I expressed it the other day. I think the personal equation had much to do with it.

Mr. LIPPITT. May I interrupt the Senator further? The Senator from Mississippi is bringing the name of Thomas Jefferson into this question. On the contrary, Jefferson had absolutely nothing to do with the formation of the Constitution. Jefferson was in Paris at that time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said this was a letter written from Paris, did I not?

Mr. LIPPITT. If the Senator from Iowa will pardon me one minute, Jefferson was in Paris at that time, and when the draft of the Constitution was sent to him one thing that he more than anything else objected to was this question of the eligibility of the President. He felt that it would inevitably result in a permanent President, and in the most extravagant language wrote those views to several of his friends in this country. On the other hand, George Washington, who while he took no active part in the debates on this subject, writing just a short time after the receipt of Jefferson's letters in this country on the same subject, said that the matter had been decided to his full satisfaction.

As a plain matter of fact, when the final vote upon this question was taken it is rather a curious illustration of the way the minds of the men who composed that convention changed as the result of their deliberations; the only State that voted against the present method of electing the President was the State of North Carolina, which, when the first vote had been taken for the purpose of making the President ineligible and his term seven years, had been one of the States that had voted against that method of electing the President, assuming probably that they were in favor of a shorter term of eligibility. In other words, all the States that had been at first in favor of noneligibility came over to the side of eligibility, and the State that voted finally the other way was one of the States that voted against it at the first instance. As a matter of fact, with scarcely an exception all the men who composed that convention finally came to the view which has been engrafted in the Constitution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Iowa will pardon me just a moment longer, I was rather unfortunate if I conveyed the impression that this was the language used by Mr. Jefferson in America. I thought I said he wrote the letter from Paris to his friends after the Constitution had been decided upon and had been submitted to the people. That is what took place.

The people who were opposed to the Constitution as it first came from the convention were opposed to it mainly upon three grounds: First, that it contained no bill of rights; secondly, that it contained no express assertion that all authority not delegated was reserved to the States—they insisted upon that—and, third, this question of the ineligibility of the President. This letter was read by me to show what Mr. Jefferson from abroad advised his friends; and, by the way, his letters were used in the Virginia convention to secure the adoption; and had his great name and influence been with George Mason, and with Monroe, and with Richard Henry Lee, and the other men who were opposing the adoption Virginia never would have adopted the Constitution, and if Virginia had not adopted it the scheme would not have gone into operation.

I quoted it to prove that he recognized at that time—that it was in his mind and therefore by analogy to infer that it was in other people's minds—that during the lifetime of George Washintgon, at any rate, this ineligibility should not be engrafted upon the Constitution, he himself saying that "the thing having been established as it is now, I would not have it changed during the lifetime of our great chief," as he called him. I think that idea was in the mind of very many of the people in the convention. It evidently was in the mind of somebody who had written to Jefferson, to whom Jefferson was replying in writing this letter; and it was in the mind of very many people, and very reasonably so, too. After the Government was once taught to march properly, after it had become stable, after the people had become accustomed to the institutions, after the Union had lasted long enough to cement its several parts together, then he helped for a change to the first principle that he had advocated.

Mr. CUMMINS. I fear this very interesting discussion about an immaterial matter has obscured the point I was trying to make.

However, I might as well add the result of my recollection as to the matter that has now been propounded. The truth is that there was a very large amount of discussion on this question from the beginning of the convention up to the middle of July, but although it had been decided this way and that way, and possibly half a dozen different times, finally, on the 26th of July, the convention submitted to the committee that I have already mentioned the resolutions which up to that time had the concurrence of the convention tentatively, and those resolutions included a seven-year term election by the National Legislature and ineligibility.

On the 6th day of August this committee reported, approving the resolutions in that respect and recommending the adoption of a constitution containing those provisions.

Now, mark you, that was on the 6th day of August. Then ensued weeks of discussion, but not upon this subject. On the 30th of August a committee of 11 was elected which reported on September 4 substantially in favor of the Constitution as it now is in this respect. The convention adjourned within a few days after that time, as I remember it, and there was no extended discussion upon the question after the report of the last committee. The votes had mainly been taken before then. I do not remember of any important debate that occurred upon the resolutions after that time.

I did not, however, refer to the history of the convention for the purpose of ascertaining whether it was for or against ineligibility. It finally was against ineligibility, and I accept that. It was against it, however, because it believed that it had found a plan of election through which the President would be independent of all influences save his own sense of duty. I have brought it to the attention of the Senate because I believe that the developments of the 125 years or more of our national existence, the national experience, the observations of thoughtful patriots, must lead us to believe that influences have arisen since the adoption of the Constitution, unknown and unanticipated by its framers, which ought to be guarded against as sedulously and as effectually as the fathers attempted to guard against the undue influence of the National Legislature over the Executive.

I agree that our forefathers intended that the President of the United States should be free and independent; I agree that they believed that he ought to be undisturbed and unvexed by any thought save the execution of the Constitution and the laws of the United States; they believed that they were devising a plan that would accomplish that result. History, however, has taught us that they failed to perceive the influences that would arise. They failed to understand that a President in office and eligible to reelection must devote his time, his abilities, and his power for reelection in order to escape the censure that would otherwise be inferred. When we propose here ineligibility, we are proceeding upon the same principle which animated our forefathers; we are seeking to protect the presidential office against the same dangers in character that were present in the minds of the men who finally adopted the Constitution, and I believe that we can render no higher service to the people of this country than by giving them a chance to exercise the most important, the most sacred, the most vital power or privilege which the freemen of any country can exercise—the opportunity to say what their Constitution shall be in the days to come.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I desire to ask him a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senator has made a very interesting presentation of his views. I confess, however, to being a little disappointed at his not developing or considering in his remarks more than he has done this phase of the question: What advantage is gained or what compensation have the people in return for giving up the check and restraint which they can now exercise upon the President by reason of their having the power at the end of four years to put the seal of condemnation upon his acts? For instance, an active campaign is waged, one of intensity, one of very deep interest, among the whole people of the United States in relation to the solution of a great controversial issue, and a President has been elected who the people expected would represent their view in the settlement of that controversy, and within three or four months after his election and after his being installed in office they discover that, while he may not be corrupt or dishonest, his real sympathies, the real viewpoint by which he is governed, is not what they expected it to be, and that influences far more conservative, on the one hand, perhaps, or far more radical, on the other hand, perhaps, than the viewpoint which they expected him to take is the viewpoint by which he is being governed. Now, if he can immediately assure himself that he can follow his own bent and inclination without harm, because he is going to hold this office for six years, and the people have no power to exercise any influence or check or restraint upon him, and the coterie of advisers who are congenial to him, who may represent him, and whom the people consider absolutely inimical are his chief advisers, they are helpless, because this opportunity to put the seal of condemnation upon his acts in the case of reelection within the shorter period during which he can continue to abuse their confidence has been destroyed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in so far as the real duties of the Chief Executive are concerned, I think I have answered the question propounded by the Senator from South Dakota. It is plainly evident that his view of what a President should be and what he should do is vastly different from mine. I deplore the fact that the Presidents of the United States have in recent years attempted to be or to manage the Government of the United States, have attempted to establish policies to which they have coerced everybody who could be brought within the influence of their great power. I do not look upon a President of the United States from any such standpoint. I think he is elected to execute the law, and that he ought to do it without courting the popular favor or the favor of special interests. The President, if he is conscientious, has vastly less discretion than would appear from the general view that we accept now of Presidential duties. I think the people of this country ought to be taught that their legislation is to come from Congress and that the policies of the country, so far as they are established and perpetuated by legislation, are to be established by Congress. I therefore have not looked at the question from the standpoint occupied by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Well, Mr. President, I can see that in its relationship to the people the Senator would give narrower scope and environment to the office of President than I would. I think it is absolutely right that the President should seek to be of assistance to the American people in shaping policies; but that is not the particular idea I wanted to emphasize.

Mr. CUMMINS. As a man that is true, and as a President, he may recommend to Congress whatsoever he desires; but I do not believe, as I have often said, that a President, nominated by a party and elected by the people, should be permitted to set up a standard of loyalty or of patriotism, either to the party or to the country, and to hold every man disloyal who did not accept it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But I want to call the Senator's attention to another feature, which I regard as a very important one, and that is, the opportunity to bring to bear upon the conduct of public officials, whether they are in Congress or whether they occupy executive offices, the power of the people of the United States to bring to bear upon them the effect of wholesome public opinion. The Senator knows that oftentimes a lethargy is in possession of this Congress, so that year after year goes by and no action whatever is taken, although a clamor exists among the people of the United States for some specific relief—it may be railway legislation; it may be tariff revision, or what not—and yet we are sluggish, inactive, unresponsive, and finally the power of public opinion knocking at these doors compels results. Now, I would have the power of public opinion have the same opportunity to influence Executive action. If Executive action is slow, unresponsive, hesitating, or if Executive action is inclined to be wrong, I think this opportunity to put the seal of disapproval upon the conduct of the Executive furnishes one of the strongest weapons in the hands of the people to compel the consideration of public interests that the people have in their possession; and would not this amendment absolutely take it away?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all, Mr. President, unless it is assumed that the people deliberately select a scoundrel for President of the United States. If they do make so unwise a selection as that, of course I think some of the results that have been indicated by the Senator from South Dakota would follow; but I am assuming that a man enters the presidential office with honest purposes, with the intent and capacity to execute or perform his duty, and I am seeking simply to remove from him those influences which, in my opinion, will and which, in my opinion, have, in a great many instances, diverted the Chief Executive from the path that he ought to have pursued.

During the delivery of Mr. CUMMINS's speech,

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I send to the desk a proposed amendment that I intend to offer at the proper time, or I will offer it now if I may do so and have it pending. I am obliged to leave the Chamber, and that is the reason why I ask leave to offer it now. I will discuss it later.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut proposes the amendment now?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will propose it now if it is in order. I am not familiar with the parliamentary situation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is still in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thought it was in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My impression is that the RECORD shows it is in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The RECORD does not show that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well. Then I do not desire to offer the amendment as in Committee of the Whole, because it is similar to one that was voted down in Committee of the Whole. I will present it in the Senate.

After the conclusion of Mr. CUMMINS's speech,

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah submits an amendment to the amendment of the committee, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 10, of the committee amendment, after the word "election," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the foregoing shall not operate to extend the term of the President in office at the time this amendment is adopted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I am not certain whether the amendment is in order in Committee of the Whole, in view of the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], which was voted down, and I submit that parliamentary question to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the amendment is identical with the amendment which was voted down, the Chair would be of opinion that it ought to be withheld until the joint resolution shall have been reported to the Senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then I give notice that I will offer the amendment when the joint resolution reaches the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators responded to their names:

Ashurst	Cummins	Lippitt	Simmons
Bankhead	Dillingham	McLean	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Bourne	Gallinger	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Bradley	Gamble	Oliver	Smoot
Bristow	Gronna	Page	Stephenson
Burnham	Hitchcock	Paynter	Swanson
Burton	Jackson	Percy	Thomas
Catron	Johnson, Me.	Perkins	Thornton
Chamberlain	Johnston, Ala.	Perky	Townsend
Clapp	Jones	Poindexter	Wetmore
Clark, Wyo.	Kavanaugh	Richardson	Williams
Clarke, Ark.	Kenyon	Root
Crawford	La Follette	Shively

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the call of the roll 54 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I do not desire to go over a second time the merits of this resolution. I can not consent, however, that a vote shall be taken without some reference on my part to the argument made by the Senator from Iowa as to the duty of the Senate to submit this resolution to the people in the nature of a referendum.

The charge of the Senator from Iowa that those who are opposed to this resolution are opposing a progressive measure, a measure which represents the principles of a political movement which has come recently to be known by that name, coming from that Senator, who has been such a distinguished champion of progressiveism in the United States, is a charge which can not be passed over without some defense.

The Senator from Iowa has for many years, in his own State and throughout the Nation, come to be known as a champion of liberal policies. He led a movement which his party finally accepted by a declaration in its platform; and if the party, when it was returned to power after a campaign conducted upon that platform, had kept its pledges, the division of the party which has taken place and its deposition from the seat of government would not have occurred.

I do not share, though, the pessimism and the discouragement expressed by the Senator from Iowa as to the hope which he said he once had, and which I think all progressives had, and most of them still have, that there would be a real and a natural division of political parties in this country by which, on the one hand, those who advocate progressive policies would gather themselves in a party which might be called a liberal or, if you choose, a radical party, drawing to itself progressive elements from all of the old parties, or from those of no party; and, on the other hand, those who were opposed would gather themselves together in a tory party, or a conservative, reactionary, or standpat party. I say, I can not share his feeling that that result will not yet come about.

I think there is a seething movement lying underneath the surface of party organization in all of the old parties which is constantly tending toward that end. I think there has been an actual accomplishment—sometimes not acknowledging itself by the adoption of a party name, but shown by the votes in both branches of Congress, shown by the cooperation of members of different parties who believe in progressive principles, in the States, and in the conduct of campaigns—proving that this movement is not only not hopeless, but that it is gaining ground, that it has accomplished results, and that ultimately there will be here, as there is in every other country which has a government by party, a logical division between those of liberal and progressive principles and those who believe in reaction.

Mr. President, it is certainly a legitimate argument on the part of the Senator from Iowa that if the question before the Senate is in the nature of a referendum, as he contends it is, it would be in line and in harmony with and in fact would be required by the principles of the Progressive Party, regardless of the individual views of the Members of the Senate that they should adopt the resolution, not for the purpose of expressing their conviction upon the merits of the matter, but for the purpose of submitting it to the people that the people might decide whether the Constitution was to be amended or not.

I am willing to agree with the Senator from Iowa that the Constitution should be more elastic, that it should be more easily susceptible of amendment, that it should be in a larger degree, at least, more responsive to the people. It is difficult for me, however, to harmonize that portion of the argument of the Senator from Iowa with the concluding part of his argument, in which he seemed rather to tend to the opposite extreme, judging from the illustrations which he made, in which he seemed to contend that the Constitution should be fixed so that the people could only with great difficulty change it, and that it was necessary for the people——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just allow me to conclude the sentence—to put restraints upon themselves which they were not able with readiness to remove, to bring about just and orderly government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington has very greatly misunderstood me. I am sure nothing I said would bear that interpretation, because it has been one of the fundamental tenets of my political faith that many of the obstacles in the way of amending constitutions ought to be removed. I think there ought to be an initiative with regard to the Constitution so that the people themselves, without the intervention of any legislative branch of the Government, could compel the submission of a constitutional proposal.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand that that is the Senator's view. I have always understood, at least, that that general policy was advocated by the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think, however, that the people ought to change their Constitution without the opportunity for mature and deliberate reflection and consideration. I am sure the Senator will agree with me in that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Entirely.

Mr. CUMMINS. When it comes to the merits of a particular proposal, that is quite a different matter. I believe there are rules which the people ought to lay down for their own guidance and that they ought not to depend upon their action at a particular time respecting many of the subjects of government. I think the Senator from Washington will agree with me about that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do agree, and that is why I am not discouraged in the belief that we will be able to cooperate toward that one grand, and I hope not far off, if not divine event—the uniting of all progressives in one party.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not pessimistic about that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The fact that we may differ about this particular measure does not discourage me in the belief that we may agree about the underlying principle, because the question here is simply as to a means for accomplishing a result upon which I think we are in harmony.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator from Washington will not think I have any doubt about the progress, with accelerated speed and effectiveness, of the great progressive movement of the last decade. What I said with regard to that was that I rather despaired of being able to gather the progressives into a single political organization, in view of the great difference of opinion among progressives as to the merits of a particular measure.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There always will be that difference of opinion about particular measures or particular agencies. I do not think it is cause for discouragement, for instance, that we have different opinions about this particular measure. Just as it is said "there is one glory of the sun and another glory of the moon and another glory of the stars, and one star differeth from another star in glory," so real Progressives differ as to the means and agencies for bringing about the result upon which they are agreed.

I think we are all agreed, for instance, that there should be in this country a rule of law rather than of men, and that it should operate uniformly and equally on all alike; that force and violence and fraud, from whatever source, should be subjected to the law. I mention these very general propositions because it is a live question. We have seen the rule of law departed from, and the rule of force and violence and fraud and bribery substituted in its place, both by those who are mighty in their power, although private citizens, and by those who are their servants. We have seen the corporations use these means, and we have seen the labor unions use them.

I understand that all progressives are agreed that one object to be accomplished by this great movement is that all, whether individuals or corporations or labor unions, shall be subjected to law, and that the law shall operate upon them all equally. That is one general principle upon which we are all agreed. I am sorry to say that there are many political opponents of ours who, while they may pretend to believe in that doctrine, do not practice it; and many of them boldly admit that they do not believe in it, but assert that there must and ought to be special privilege and special exemption in this country.

I think we are all agreed that, while there is wealth and ought to be, and while it should have its personal enjoyment and opportunity and the social advantages which wealth gives, wealth should not command legal advantages; that mere money should not be above manhood nor above the Government nor above the officers and the Senators of the people, but that the officers of the Government should be above mere property and its agents.

I think we are all agreed, as progressives—most of us, at least—that while the natural resources of the country and the great wealth of the public lands should be developed, and even developed by private means, for the increment and for the benefit of the private means which develop them, yet there should be attached to that development, and to the franchises under which it operates, certain conditions and restraints by which the Nation whose property this is shall share in the profits and in the increment which comes from its use and its enjoyment. There are many of our opponents who do not believe in that principle, but who are seeking, by one means or another, to escape from it, sometimes by advocating State control of natural resources, which, in their minds, means no control at all.

It is true, as I said, that I agree with the Senator from Iowa that the people should have reasonable opportunity to amend the Constitution.

If we were operating here under an elastic law by which, upon certain conditions, this resolution coming before us should be submitted to the people for their consideration and rejection or ratification, I would readily consent that we should so act. I would favor a law of that nature, of course with certain restrictions and under certain conditions.

But I can not consent to the doctrine advanced by the Senator from Iowa that we must surrender our opinions as to the merits of this resolution, and that because it is presented here by a Senator and advocated by some Senators, and because, as is said, during the 124 years of the life of Congress under the Constitution a number of similar resolutions have been presented, and because Thomas Jefferson in his time, which was a century or more ago, favored this principle, we must surrender our judgment as to what is best for the American people to-day and permit the resolution to take its course under the Constitution after Congress has ratified it by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. As I understand it, if the Senator will excuse me, while Thomas Jefferson seemed to favor a continuous term, did he not connect that with the principle of the recall by the people of the President if he was unsatisfactory?

Mr. POINDEXTER. He did. Furthermore, I would say upon that point, that whatever Jefferson may have advocated—a letter was read here this morning which indicated that he did not advocate the ineligibility of the incumbent to such an extent that he opposed the adoption of the Constitution on that account—whatever may have been his views or whatever may have been the views of some of his contemporaries or their successors in the conduct of public affairs in this country, it still remains that the consensus of opinion in the Federal convention and in the decades which followed it from that time to this has been opposed to this contention.

When the convention adjourned it appeared to be unanimously in favor of the system which is now established. Many similar resolutions have been introduced in Congress, but they have never met with sufficient favor, so far as I am informed, to attain a two-thirds vote in either branch of Congress.

The Senator from Iowa assumes that there is a public demand for it, and on that account he would submit it to the people and surrender our views upon the merits of it. I disagree with him upon that. I want to cite an instance, and I hesitate to do it because I think probably my motives will be misconstrued. I wish to call attention to the condition of affairs when Mr. Roosevelt went out of office. I say it without any consideration whatever of personal affiliation or personal preference as to the Presidency or personal ambition or personal desires. I sincerely believe, and I think it will be admitted by many, at least, of those who are frank and who apparently opposed Mr. Roosevelt, that, notwithstanding the fact that he had served practically two terms in the Presidency, he would have received the approval of the American people by election to a third term if he had been willing to receive it at that time.

It indicated the view of the American people on the doctrine of ineligibility when more than 4,000,000 votes were cast for Mr. Roosevelt in the last campaign, conducted with an imperfect organization, after an effort of a few weeks by a new and untried organization, gotten hastily together. Does that indicate that the American people have any deep-seated conviction that under those circumstances they should not reelect a man who had already served in the Presidency? I do not think that it does.

I have not seen any evidence, I have not seen nor heard in the address of the Senator from Iowa anything upon which I think it can be predicated that any substantial proportion of the American people are concerned in the adoption of this resolution. But even if they were, is it incumbent upon us, upon the record here and upon the showing which has been made, to throw aside our convictions upon this particular measure because we might believe in a referendum or in the elasticity of the Constitution and act contrary to our convictions upon this question? However elastic the Constitution might be, and however the referendum might be established, under any system when men in the Senate and out of the Senate are called upon to vote they are supposed to vote their judgment and their convictions upon the particular thing on which they are voting and not to vote in favor of an amendment to the Constitution, a very important one, which they do not believe in and which they think would be injurious, which they believe would be dangerous, which might be of fatal consequences in some crisis, in order to indicate that they are in favor of a general principle which is involved. Yet that is the substance of the argument of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator has touched the point that has troubled me a great deal in this discussion, and I should like to ask him a question. If a substantial part of our population desired certain changes in the Constitution and the only way they could reach that matter would be through their legislatures, the legislature or the convention approving it, and if the Senator did not believe in the proposition that a substantial majority of the people might want, would he still believe it was his duty to vote to give them a chance to express their belief, regardless of his own opinion?

I am not in favor of this amendment, but this is not the adoption of the amendment to the Constitution. It is merely giving a chance, in the only way there is a chance, for the people, acting through their legislatures, to amend the Constitution. What is the Senator's idea about that?

Mr. POINDEXTER. My idea about that is that if a Senator is opposed to the resolution strongly, if his convictions are fixed, if he is of the opinion that it would be a governmental mistake of deep significance, exercising his duty here in a vote which while the Senator says is not the adoption of the amendment may lead to the adoption of the amendment, which is the first step in the adoption of the amendment, he should vote his convictions and his judgment upon the merits of the question. That is what he is here for. That is the function which he is performing as a Senator.

If it were perfectly plain, I will say to the Senator from Iowa, under the Constitution that a Senator in so voting to submit an amendment is not necessarily expressing his convictions on the subject and on the merits of the question, but that he is simply voting in order to give the people an opportunity, and if that were the system under which we were operating, of course a Senator ought to vote that way. It would be his duty to so vote under that system, because he would then be voting in accordance with law, in accordance with the Constitution. But when the Constitution puts the Senate as a political court to determine the merits of the question, their votes are regarded by the people of the country as an indication of their views. Leaders in the several States constitute the membership of this body, and their views may influence the judgment of their constituents to some extent, at least; and their constituents are entitled to their judgment upon the merits of the question.

Mr. KENYON. If the question were to be submitted directly to the people for ratification, then I take it the Senator would be in favor of submitting this amendment to the people regardless of his own view. I do not think the people are influenced very much by the opinion of Senators. It has not been the history heretofore.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I qualified my statement by saying "to some extent." How much or how little would depend on circumstances. It would depend on the Senators and upon the conditions in their States.

I wish to say, however, pursuing the argument a little further, that what I have just been saying was assuming that if we were to submit this resolution it would be in the nature of a referendum, and I was arguing it upon that basis. That is a much stronger case than the one which is before us, because it would not be a referendum to the people. The action of the State legislatures in many instances which are required to ratify this amendment to make it effective, in instances which every Senator can recall, are as far from the popular will and from the desire of an enlightened public opinion as the nadir is from the zenith.

It is not a submission to the people, but it is a submission to a representative body many of whom hold over from year to year in the senates of the several States, which contain all the disabilities and all the disadvantages so far as being a reflection of the popular will is concerned, which has been discussed throughout the country for a generation or more in the contention about the direct election of United States Senators. It has been demonstrated in a great many States that where the people desire one man for United States Senator the legislatures abandoned their duties as legislators and the enactment of laws and devoted an entire session to controversy about the election of men none of whom the people would favor.

I only mention that as illustrating that the votes of legislatures upon this question need not and probably would not represent the popular will. I have known in my own State many times when the people overwhelmingly desired certain legislation it was impossible to obtain it in the legislature. The secret influences which have been spoken of that operate at times upon the high office of President, or with a possibility of operating there, have the same possibility of operating in the legislatures, and do operate there and have operated there. In many instances it became known and published. Many instances were not known.

The senior Senator from Iowa bases, in part, his argument in favor of this resolution upon its advocacy by some great men in the early days of the Republic. I have already said that while those men advocated it they did not represent the consensus of opinion; but even though they did represent the consensus of opinion, even though it was generally advocated and the Constitution had been adopted contrary to the public will, so far as this provision is concerned it would not be a reason, in my judgment, why we should change the provision at this time, because the conditions under which the country is governed and the necessities and needs as to the Federal Government and the views of the people toward the Federal Constitution have been revolutionized in the last hundred years.

When the Federal Constitution was adopted it was not a Democratic instrument, but it was so framed that the people could not readily control the Government. It was what we would call a reactionary instrument as viewed from the conditions of affairs at the time of the Revolution itself. It was in a great wave of democracy which upheld the armies, the Declaration of Independence, and the principles of government expressed there, and which sustained the great movement against the wealth of the country, against the Tories and the King and Parliament of Great Britain. There had been, after the Revolution, a reaction. There had been a swinging back of the pendulum. There was a jealousy not only on the part of the States but on the part of the people against the Federal Government. They did not need so much government in those days. The purpose of the Government is to restrain the aggressions of the strong against the weaker ones in the community. There were not any very strong in the community in those days. All were comparatively equal.

Now, the question is the control, the regulation, the restraint not only of those who are stronger than they were at the time the Senator from Iowa holds up as a precedent, but stronger private individuals controlling greater influence over the conditions of their neighbors and the masses of the people than any other country ever had in any age of the world.

So the question is where is the authority coming from for the necessary restraint of this power, which in the hands of selfishness and avarice is used to oppress, to extort an undue share from the people of the wealth of the country? It can not come from any source except the Federal Government. The tendency now is not to limit the powers of the Federal Government, but it is to extend them and to avoid the dangers which were apprehended from a strong Federal Government, by at the same time establishing agencies which give the people control over the Federal Government.

I pointed out, and I do not care to repeat it, that one of these new agencies is the nomination of a President by a direct primary, which removes the possibility of the abuse of patronage. We saw in the last election a demonstration as perfect as it could be that this country has nothing to fear from the abuse of patronage under this new system of party patronage—that nomination of a President by the people can not be brought about by the abuse of patronage. Patronage was abused. Patronage was used to every extent to which it could be used to secure a renomination. It was justified by those who used it as having been the practice of their predecessors in office. But the result of it was 8 electoral votes in the electoral college, 4 of them from Vermont gained by a margin of 1,200 plurality, and 4 of them from the State of Utah gained with the support and power of the great religious organization in that State which supported the Republican candidate for the Presidency.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the statement the Senator has just made is not correct.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am not saying this in any hostile sense toward the State of Utah; I am simply citing as an illustration the narrow margin by which those eight electoral votes were obtained. Is it not true that the president of the Mormon Church issued a public declaration prior to the election advising the adherents of that religious faith to support Mr. Taft for the Presidency?

Mr. SMOOT. It is not true, Mr. President. He did not advise anybody to vote for President Taft. He spoke of President Taft's administration in connection with a statement that he made in relation to the conditions in Mexico. The State of Utah, of course, did not cast the number of votes for President Taft that it did four years ago by something like thirteen or fourteen thousand. I have not the exact figures here.

Mr. POINDEXTER. He got a pretty fine vote in Utah; much better than he did in Vermont.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not state as to Vermont, but the Republican Party carried the State of Utah by between six and seven thousand votes. They carried it four years before by, I think, twenty-odd thousand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the junior Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The truth about it is that——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to say in explanation, before the Senator makes his statement—I do not want to be misunderstood about it—that I am not making any attack upon President Smith nor upon the Mormon Church at this time, nor any criticism of what he did. I am simply referring to the fact, if my statement is a fact, and if it is not correct I will be glad to be corrected; but if I am not correct, then there are thousands of good Mormons throughout Idaho and Utah who were misled in this statement, because they believed that the president of the church was in favor of the election of Mr. Taft.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the fact is that President Taft carried the strongest non-Mormon county in the State, namely, the county of Salt Lake. Indeed, he procured the greater part of his majority——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that was probably due to the fact that the junior Senator from Utah lives there and supported him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course, that may have had something to do with it. I can not enter into a discussion of that. But that is the fact. It is also a fact that President Taft was supported by the strongest non-Mormon newspaper in the State, a newspaper which has been in the past bitterly antagonistic to the Mormon Church. It is also a fact that he lost the vote—that is, a majority of the vote went against him—in two of the strongest Mormon counties in the State, namely, the county of Utah and the county of Cache, where there are comparatively few non-Mormons.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understood there was an insurgent movement among the Mormons.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. There was an insurgent movement of a limited extent throughout the State. It did not materialize sufficiently to carry the State away from Mr. Taft. But what I am stating to the Senator is a fact.

Now, as far as Idaho is concerned, I have no information as to the vote. It is true that President Smith some time prior to the election, when the administration had been criticized for its conduct in the affairs of Mexico, published an article on that subject, in which, as I recall it, he advocated the attitude of the administration; but he gave no instruction of any kind.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is it or is it not true that that statement from the president of the Mormon Church, made, I think, on Saturday or Friday, was read the following Sunday morning before the election in every Mormon Church in Utah?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think that is true.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator that that is absolutely false. There is not a word of truth in it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. How many churches was it read in?

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever the Sunday before the election, or any other Sunday.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very glad the Senator has put himself on record in that regard. I asked the question. I have seen a published statement to that effect.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator undertakes to judge the people of Utah by statements that he may see from time to time in the press, he certainly will misjudge them most of the time, because the press in general contain articles of a sensational character rather than statements of facts.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not make the statement, but only inquired of the Senator from Utah in regard to the matter. The statement which I did make as to President Smith is in substance, I believe, correct.

Now, I think that is all I have to say upon the first suggestion of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], in the first place, that we are not called upon here to act in the capacity of passing a referendum, but that we are called upon here to vote upon a constitutional amendment; and, in the second place, that even if we did act as though we were referring a referendum it would not have that effect and there would be no referendum, because there is no opportunity for the people to vote upon the proposition.

Before I pass, however, from the reference of the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to the matter which was just under discussion, stating that he did not know what the conditions were in the State of Idaho, I want to say that the conditions there were that Col. Roosevelt, who with a number of other men—it makes no difference whatever to me who it affects—would be excluded by the operation of this joint resolution, if it were adopted, from being a candidate, received over 25,000 votes, without having the names of his electors on the ballot, on account of the decision of a court which under a strained, and as I am advised by competent lawyers in Idaho—and it is my own opinion—an unwarranted construction of the statutes of that State issued a writ of injunction against the printing of the names of the Progressive presidential electors upon the ballot. That was the condition in Idaho.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington further yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. How does the result in Idaho, under the conditions the Senator has stated, differ from that in California where another candidate for the Presidency was affected?

Mr. POINDEXTER. They differ very radically from the conditions in California, because the Republicans in California had an opportunity to put the names of their electors upon the ballot and refused to use it, preferring, what no doubt, if they were willing to subordinate principle, was a fine piece of political strategy and tactics upon their part, to combine with the Democrats in order to defeat the Progressives.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The decision in California, as I recall, came too late for the regular Republicans to have the names on the ballot by a regular petition.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In California all parties had the same opportunity to put their electors upon the ballot. The Republicans could have done it in the same way that the Progressives did. It was a question whether or not the names of the presidential candidates should be printed on the ballot.

The Progressives were willing their candidate's name should be printed there. The Republicans had a candidate—I do not feel like referring to these various individuals—whose name they did not want printed on the ballot, and they refused to put their electors on the ballot as Taft Republicans. That is the reason why they did not put them there. That was the decision of the court. The same rule applied to all parties. But in Idaho there was an absolute inhibition against the Progressives from printing the names of electors on the ballot at all, and notwithstanding that fact they came near carrying the State, polling substantially a third of the vote in this three-cornered contest.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Do I understand that one of the reasons why the Senator is opposed to this proposed constitutional amendment is that it would except ex-President Roosevelt from being a candidate hereafter for President?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not at all. I think my vote indicates that that is not my position.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was trying to reconcile the Senator's vote yesterday on my amendment. He stated just now that one of the evils of the amendment pending would be to exclude ex-President Roosevelt, who had been so popular in Idaho and other States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator misapprehended my remarks. I did not say that one of the evils would be that it excluded him. I said that it would exclude him. That is quite different from saying it would be an evil. My opinion is if it was adopted at all it ought to exclude him, and I voted that way and believe that way. I do not hold any brief for ex-President Roosevelt or anyone else in this matter. I believe that he ought to have been elected President of the United States because he had a legitimate majority of delegates in the Republican national convention, and I think he would have been elected if he had had a united party behind him and had been nominated there.

But that has nothing to do with this question. What I did say was that the number of votes that were cast for him, while he would be excluded by this amendment, indicates that popular opinion is not demanding the amendment. That is the point I am making.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So the Senator's position is this: He is opposed to the proposed constitutional amendment because it proposes to limit the power of the people to select their candidates.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yet if it is adopted he wants it to go so far as to exclude ex-President Roosevelt.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do. That is my position exactly. If it is to operate at all, of course it should operate on all alike.

Mr. President, only one word with reference to the merits of the question. The senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] said that there was no country in the world which was ruled by a majority. I do not agree with that; I think that there are some countries that are ruled by a majority; but I do not know of any country in the world which has restricted itself from keeping a fit man in office, as this resolution proposes to do. I know there are some countries that are ruled by a minority; and there are some countries that are ruled by one man. I am not in favor of an unconstitutional government; I am in favor of a constitutional government, with all due restrictions upon the power of the majority, but I would much rather have a country ruled by a majority than to have one ruled by a minority or than to have one ruled by a monarchy. I think that that is one of the general distinctions between the progressives and the reactionary parties.

The Progressive Party prefers the opinion and the power of the majority, and the reactionary party prefer the power and the control of a minority, because they have no faith in the ability and the intelligence of the masses to operate the Government whether directly of through representatives.

Of course, there is nothing involved in this discussion or in any of the new agencies of government which in any way justifies the attacks which have been made by the "stand-pat" Republicans throughout the country upon that movement on the ground that it is undermining the foundations of the Constitution. It does not deal with the Constitution; it does not affect in any way whatever the substance or the principle of representative government, but it makes representative government more responsive to the people.

One objection that I have to this amendment is not that it gives too much power to the Government, but that it makes the Government too weak. The constant change in the administration of the Government, the compelled and absolute requirement that there shall be rotation in office under all circumstances, obviously weakens the Government.

As I said before, that was the object in the early days of this Republic. The object was to weaken the Government. I am in favor, and I think many other Progressives are in favor, although they are misunderstood upon that subject, of strengthening the Government. I think it will have to be strengthened if it is going to be able to deal with modern political problems, but at the same time the people should be given control over it; in other words, the Government should be responsive and at the same time it should be responsible. Agencies can be adopted, and have been adopted, by which the evils that come from the eligibility for reelection to the office of President can be removed and eligibility for reelection to the office can still be retained.

I am not in favor of the indefinite continuance of the President in office. I think that reasonable rotation in office, when it is voluntary, when it is in response to public opinion, as it has been in this country, is a good thing; but when it ceases to be in response to an enlightened public opinion; when it is imposed contrary to the will of the people by a Constitution, which may have been adopted 50 years before the problems originated with which it has to deal and solve, it is not progressive; it does not tend to enable the people, through their Government, to restrain the evils of private monopoly, growing out of the great modern agencies of industry and transportation—the telegraph, modern machinery, and steam locomotion.

The Senator from Iowa said that there was no Government ruled by a majority. I think England is ruled substantially by a majority. I am not going to repeat the comparison between the Government of England and our Government. It is natural to make it because the English are our forbears; we speak their language, and have substantially their laws. Our capacity for self-government and the love of liberty we inherited from them.

Why does not the majority rule in England substantially? Of course they have a King, but he is about like a queen bee in a hive. He is absolutely under the control of the people; his functions are largely those of a social leader. The entire Government of Great Britain is elected by a majority of the people at one time. There are no checks in the way of hold-over members of the House of Commons; there are no checks in the way of courts that can set aside the acts of Parliament; there are no checks in the way of a veto, which either the House of Lords or the King can impose upon the acts of the House of Commons made in response to well-settled public opinion. That is a Government by a majority, and it is a successful Government by a majority. It is true that the majority have imposed certain restraints upon themselves in the way of a bill of rights. We have inherited that bill of rights, and we have modeled it to meet our conditions here; but I refuse absolutely in this argument to have the argument transplanted by the Senator from Iowa into a proposition of whether there should be any constitutional restraint or whether there should be this particular constitutional restraint.

We are not debating here the question of whether or not there should be trial by jury fixed in the Constitution, whether or not there should be an inhibition against the violation of contracts, or the right to bear arms or that property can not be taken without due process of law. Of course such provisions ought to be in the Constitution; of course those principles are sound; but because the principle in general is sound does it follow that we must limit the term of the President and make him ineligible for reelection? What connection is there between the Bill of Rights and the tenure of office of the Chief Executive? There is not any whatever. We can concede the general principle advocated by the Senator from Iowa and yet oppose this particular proposed provision of the Constitution, which could not have any other effect than to cripple the Government and to cripple the people in wrestling with the great questions with which they are compelled to wrestle through the Government, which is the only agency they have with which to deal with them. The safety of the Constitution is in its justice and wisdom. An unjust or unwise amendment is but a weakness and temptation to violate it, and disrespect for the fundamental law endangers the Republic.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I want to take up about six minutes of the time of the Senate; but before this debate closes, and before the vote is taken, I want to have presented to the Senate the most comprehensive argument, boiled down in a few words, presenting more phases of this subject than any other argument that has ever yet been made on this question.

We heard yesterday from the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] quotations from Charles Sumner and, I think, one from Henry Clay; and the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] many times referred to the views of Mr. Jefferson on this much-mooted question at the time of the holding of the constitutional convention. But the views of Hamilton himself, the greatest mentality of them all, have not in this debate even been suggested, I think, by any Senator. Hamilton 125 years ago said all that has since been said on this same subject. He said it in a very few and concise words. I should like to have the entire Senate hear it, for it is almost equal to Washington's Farewell Address, to which we devote one day during each session. Therefore, before I ask the Secretary to read the article in the Federalist, I should like to suggest the absence of a quorum, so that we may have a fuller house to hear Alexander Hamilton's viewpoint.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cummins	Lippitt	Shively
Bankhead	Curtis	Lodge	Simmons
Bourne	Dillingham	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Dixon	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Bristow	du Pont	Oliver	Smith, Md.
Brown	Fletcher	Overman	Smoot
Bryan	Gallinger	Page	Stephenson
Catron	Gamble	Paynter	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Percy	Swanson
Chilton	Jackson	Perkins	Thomas
Clapp	Johnson, Me.	Poindexter	Thornton
Clark, Wyo.	Johnston, Ala.	Pomerene	Townsend
Clarke, Ark.	Jones	Richardson	Wetmore
Crawford	Kenyon	Root	Williams
Cullom	Kern	Sanders	Works

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] on account of illness in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. DIXON. Now, Mr. President, with a larger audience present, I hope Senators will pay real attention to what is probably the most powerful and concise argument yet delivered on this question, made not during the constitutional debate, but contained in an article which appeared in the Federalist, written by Hamilton after he had heard all of the arguments advanced during the entire period of the Constitutional Convention. It will take only four or five minutes to read what Hamilton had to say. I now ask that the Secretary read what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the Secretary read the matter to which he has referred. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

ALEXANDER HAMILTON ON THE QUESTION OF REELECTION.

The administration of government in its largest sense comprehends all the operations of the body politic, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, but in its most usual and, perhaps, in its most precise signification it is limited to executive details and falls peculiarly within the province of the Executive Department. The actual conduct of foreign negotiations, the preparatory plans of finance, the application and disbursement of the public moneys in conformity to the general appropriations of the legislature, the arrangement of the Army and Navy, the direction of the operations of war; these and other matters of a like nature constitute what seems to be most properly understood by the administration of government. The persons, therefore, to whose immediate management these different matters are committed ought to be considered as the assistants or deputies of the chief magistrate; and on this account they ought to derive their offices from his appointment, at least from his nomination, and ought to be subject to his superintendence. This view of the subject will at once suggest to us the intimate connection between the duration of the Executive Magistrate in office and the stability of the system of administration. To reverse and undo what has been done by a predecessor is very often considered by a successor as the best proof he can give of his own capacity and desert; and in addition to this propensity, where the alteration has been the result of public choice, the person substituted is warranted in supposing that the dismission of his predecessor has proceeded from a dislike to his measures; and that the less he resembles him the more he will recommend himself to the favor of his constituents. These considerations, and the influence of personal confidences and attachments, would be likely to induce every new President to promote a change of men to fill the subordinate stations, and these causes together could not fail to occasion a disgraceful and ruinous mutability in the administration of the Government.

With a positive duration of considerable extent, I connect the circumstance of reeligibility. The first is necessary to give to the officer himself the inclination and the resolution to act his part well, and to the community time and leisure to observe the tendency of his measures, and thence to form an experimental estimate of their merits. The last is necessary to enable the people, when they see reason to approve of his conduct, to continue him in the station in order to prolong the utility of his talents and virtues, and to secure to the Government the advantage of permanency in a wise system of administration.

Nothing appears more plausible at first sight nor more ill founded upon close inspection than a scheme which, in relation to the present point, has had some respectable advocates—I mean that of continuing the Chief Magistrate in office for a certain time and then excluding him from it, either for a limited period or forever after. This exclusion, whether temporary or perpetual, would have nearly the same effects; and these effects would be for the most part rather pernicious than salutary.

One ill effect of the exclusion would be a diminution of the inducements to good behavior. There are few men who would not feel much less zeal in the discharge of a duty when they were conscious that the advantages of the station with which it was connected must be relinquished at a determinate period than when they were permitted to entertain a hope of obtaining, by meriting, a continuance of them. This position will not be disputed so long as it is admitted that the desire of reward is one of the strongest incentives of human conduct, or that the best security for the fidelity of mankind is to make their interest coincide with their duty. Even the love of fame, the ruling passion of the noblest minds, which would prompt a man to plan and undertake extensive and arduous enterprises for the public benefit, requiring considerable time to mature and perfect them, if he could flatter himself with the prospect of being allowed to finish what he had begun, would, on the contrary, deter him from the undertaking when he foresaw that he must quit the scene before he could accomplish the work and must commit that, together with his own reputation, to hands which might be unequal or unfriendly to the task. The most to be expected from the generality of men in such a situation is the negative merit of not doing harm instead of the positive merit of doing good.

Another ill effect of the exclusion would be the temptation to sordid views, to peculation, and, in some instances, to usurpation. An avaricious man who might happen to fill the office, looking forward to a time when he must at all events yield up the emoluments he enjoyed, would feel a propensity, not easy to be resisted by such a man, to make the best use of the opportunity he enjoyed while it lasted; and might not scruple to have recourse to the most corrupt expedients to make the harvest as abundant as it was transitory; though the same man, probably, with a different prospect before him might content himself with the regular perquisities of his situation, and might even be unwilling to risk the consequences of an abuse of his opportunities. His avarice might be a guard upon his avarice. Add to this that the same man might be vain or ambitious as well as avaricious. And if he could expect to prolong his honors by his good conduct, he might hesitate to sacrifice his appetite for them to his appetite for gain. But with the prospect before him of approaching and inevitable annihilation, his avarice would be likely to get the victory over his caution, his vanity, or his ambition.

An ambitious man, too, when he found himself seated on the summit of his country's honors, when he looked forward to the time at which he must descend from the exalted eminence forever, and reflected that no exertion of merit on his part could save him from the unwelcome reverse; such a man, in such a situation, would be much more violently tempted to embrace a favorable conjuncture for attempting the prolongation of his power, at every personal hazard, than if he had the probability of answering the same end by doing his duty.

Would it promote the peace of the community or the stability of the Government to have half a dozen men, who had had credit enough to be raised to the seat of the supreme magistracy, wandering among the people like discontented ghosts and sighing for a place which they were destined never more to possess?

A third ill effect of the exclusion would be the depriving the community of the advantage of the experience gained by the Chief Magistrate in the exercise of his office. That experience is the parent of wisdom, is an adage, the truth of which is recognized by the wisest as well as the simplest of mankind. What more desirable or more essential than this quality in the governors of nations? Where more desirable or more essential than in the first magistrate of a nation? Can it be wise to put this desirable and essential quality under the ban of the Constitution and to declare that the moment it is acquired its possessor shall be compelled to abandon the station in which it was acquired and to which it is adapted? This, nevertheless, is the precise import of all those regulations which exclude men from serving their country, by the choice of their fellow citizens, after they have by a course of service fitted themselves for doing it with a greater degree of utility.

A fourth ill effect of the exclusion would be the banishing of men from stations in which, in certain emergencies of the State, their presence might be of the greatest moment to the public interest or safety.

There is no nation which has not at one period or another experienced an absolute necessity of the services of particular men; in particular situations perhaps it would not be too strong to say to the preservation of its political existence. How unwise, therefore, must be every such self-denying ordinance as serves to prohibit a nation from making use of its own citizens in the manner best suited to its exigencies and circumstances. Without supposing the personal essentiality of the man, it is evident that a change of the Chief Magistrate, at the breaking out of a war or at any similar crisis, for another, even of equal merit, would at all times be detrimental to the community, inasmuch as it would substitute inexperience for experience and would tend to unhinge and set afloat the already settled train of the administration.

A fifth ill effect of the exclusion would be that it would operate as a constitutional interdiction of the stability in the administration. By necessitating a change of men in the first office of the Nation it would necessitate a mutability of measures. It is not generally to be expected that men will vary and measures remain uniform. The contrary is the usual course of things. And we need not be apprehensive that there will be too much stability, while there is even the option of changing; nor need we desire to prohibit the people from continuing their confidence where they think it may be safely placed, and where, by constancy on their part, they may obviate the fatal inconveniencies of fluctuating councils and a variable policy.

These are some of the disadvantages which would flow from the principle of exclusion. They apply most forcibly to the scheme of a perpetual exclusion; but when we consider that even a partial exclusion would always render the readmission of the person a remote and precarious object, the observations which have been made will apply nearly as fully to one case as to the other.

What are the advantages promised to counterbalance these disadvantages? They are represented to be, first, greater independence in the Magistrate; second, greater security to the people. Unless the exclusion be perpetual, there will be no pretense to infer the first advantage. But even in that case may he have no object beyond his present station to which he may sacrifice his independence? May he have no connections, no friends, for whom he may sacrifice it? May he not be less willing by a firm conduct to make personal enemies when he acts under the impression that a time is fast approaching on the arrival of which he not only may but must be exposed to their resentments upon an equal, perhaps upon an inferior, footing? It is not an easy point to determine whether his independence would be most promoted or impaired by such an arrangement.

As to the second supposed advantage, there is still greater reason to entertain doubts concerning it. If the exclusion were to be perpetual, a man of irregular ambition, of whom alone there could be reason in any case to entertain apprehension, would, with infinite reluctance, yield to the necessity of taking his leave forever of a post in which his passion for power and preeminence had acquired the force of habit. And if he had been fortunate or adroit enough to conciliate the good will of the people he might induce them to consider, as a very odious and unjustifiable restraint upon themselves, a provision which was calculated to debar them of the right of giving a fresh proof of their attachment to a favorite. There may be conceived circumstances in which this disgust of the people, seconding the thwarted ambition of such a favorite, might occasion greater danger to liberty than could ever reasonably be dreaded from the possibility of a perpetuation in office by the voluntary suffrage of the community exercising a constitutional privilege.

There is an excess of refinement in the idea of disabling the people to continue in office men who had entitled themselves, in their opinion, to approbation and confidence, the advantages of which are at best speculative and equivocal, and are overbalanced by disadvantages far more certain and decisive.

PUBLIUS.

(The Federalist, pp. 398–403.)

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it is not at all astonishing that a follower of a man who would like to be President of the United States for life should have had read to the Senate a moment ago the utterances of Alexander Hamilton which we have just heard. It is not at all astonishing that Alexander Hamilton should have written that. Nobody acquainted with Hamilton's views would have the slightest doubt as to how Hamilton would vote to-day if this question were submitted to him. He would vote against any proposition that fixed any term of public service at all, short of life, for the President of the United States and for most other officers.

I have said that, and I want to prove it by showing that historically the plan of government presented by Alexander Hamilton for the consideration of the Constitutional Convention provided that the President should hold his office for life. It provided that the Senators should hold their offices for life. It provided that the Senate should have power to declare war and to make peace. It provided, furthermore, that the judges should be Federal judges in the States, and that they should hold their offices for life.

It is no wonder that a man who entertained these views should be favorable to any plan under which an opportunity could possibly present itself for a man to hold the office of President for life. Not only that, but under the plan which he presented to the Constitutional Convention the Federal Government was to appoint the governors of the States. It is not at all to be wondered at that a man who wanted a President to hold office for life should have made a very labored argument in favor of an indefinite tenure of presidential office, so that possibly a man might serve for life.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, in the earlier sittings of the Constitutional Convention Jefferson presented a tentative plan of his conception of a possible constitution. Along with Jefferson's plan dozens of other members of the same Constitutional Convention presented possibly not so comprehensive a scheme but as to the various details of government suggestions as widely at variance with the final work of that convention as was Hamilton's.

This was not Hamilton's opinion at the beginning of the convention. It was his judgment after having sat for three months in Philadelphia and having heard all the various schemes presented and there debated. This was his judgment months afterwards, when the ratification of the Constitution was pending before the constitutional convention of the State of New York. It was his final ripened judgment and conclusion. Notwithstanding it may not be perfect, I offer it to the Senate, and believe it is entitled to as much consideration as the views of any Senator who has presented them during this discussion, whether he be from Mississippi or from any other State. These are the views of Alexander Hamilton.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana a question before he takes his seat. He says that in the course of three months Hamilton changed his mind to the radical extent which the Senator has described. Does he not think that if Hamilton were living to-day, after the experience of 125 years that this country has had, he might by this time have agreed with us upon this subject?

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah does not exactly state what I tried to say. I say these were the final views of Hamilton, after having heard all the various suggestions that arose in the constitutional debates during the entire summer in Philadelphia.

How Hamilton would vote this afternoon, if a Member of this body, I do not know. I do not presume to have so intimate an acquaintance with his views as some other Senators have professed regarding certain other men of that period. I have heard one or two Senators freely vouch for what Jefferson would do or what Henry Clay would do after an experience of 125 years. What Hamilton would do under these conditions, I am frank to say, I do not know. But I wanted the Senate to have the benefit of his matured views after all that discussion had gone on for a space of about two years; and I commend it to the careful attention of the Senators who are advocating this amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, so far as I know, Alexander Hamilton never changed his views. If the Senator will take the trouble to read the letters of Gouveneur Morris, his nearest and dearest personal friend, the man selected by Hamilton's family to pronounce his eulogy, he will find that assertion to be supported.

In the articles in the Federalist, Hamilton was arguing not for what he believed, but for what was attainable. Hamilton, above all men at that time, desired a union between the American Colonies; and he desired a union which should be stable and fixed and permanent. Therefore, when the Constitutional Convention rejected every single proposition and sentence offered to it by Alexander Hamilton—there is not in the Constitution one sentence that proceeds from him—he still advocated the adoption of the Constitution as it left the convention, because it was, of course, very much nearer his ideal than the old confederacy, which was but a rope of sand.

A higher compliment can not be paid to any man than to say that having left his own firm foundation of faith for the purpose of advocating the nearest attainable thing to it, he did it with exceeding great ability.

What I said a moment ago was not said with the view of attacking the man's intellectual integrity. I merely wanted to reenforce the idea that a man who was in favor of life tenure for the Presidency naturally would have his mind gravitate toward every argument in favor of indefinite tenure of the Presidency.

I stated a moment ago what Hamilton's plan of government was, but I did not state that that was a compromise between Hamilton and himself; and yet it was. In the very speech in which he advocated his plan, which I have outlined, he said that if we were seeking a model government, the government which he would recommend as a model government, if it could be adopted—and he confessed that it could not be then—was one under which the office of Executive should be hereditary and not for life alone. In that same speech he went on later to give the reasons why an hereditary Executive was always better than an elective Executive—so highly paid, that he was subject to no temptation of corruption; so far above the ordinary politics of the country that he could not be the subject of any momentary tumult of feeling or of passion. I am not attempting to repeat literally what he said, of course, because I can not remember it. So that even that utterance was a compromise between himself and his advocacy of a life tenure; and his advocacy of a life tenure was a compromise between him and himself with regard to his real, original view in favor of an hereditary Executive.

It is not astonishing that the so-called new nationalism advocated by the Senator from Washington—or by the chief of the party to which he belongs, at any rate—should ally itself at every point of possible contact with ancient, discredited Federalism. They are identical in their ultimate purposes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, is there anything in the ancient federalism in the nature of direct election of Senators, or party control by primary nominations, or the referendum or the recall? Those are the things that are advocated by the "new nationalism," as the Senator from Mississippi calls it. They seem to me to be rather the antithesis of the views of Alexander Hamilton which he has just been describing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the end sought by both is a freedom from constitutional trammels and restrictions. The end sought by both is that a government shall do whatever that government thinks is right, regardless of any fundamental restriction of any description. The instrumentalities by which it is sought to accomplish the end are totally different.

In the beginning the man who wanted a government unrestricted in power sought it by frankly stating that and by frankly setting up a government hereditary in tenure of office, with a class set aside, as John Adams proposed and advocated, who should represent gentlemen as against simple men. When you come down years later, we of America have furnished the most remarkable man that has existed for a long time. His idea is, under the name of "new nationalism," by plebiscite rule, by force of the popularity of the proposer of the plebiscite, to set aside all restrictions upon a majority, so that a majority may do whatever it pleases.

There is no distinction in my mind between letting a king do whatever he pleases and letting a majority do whatever it pleases. A majority can be wrong. Even Abraham Lincoln said:

> You can fool all of the people some of the time, and you can fool some of the people all of the time.

I believe, with him, that you can not fool all of the people all the time. I believe, with Jefferson, that error is not to be feared so long as reason is left free to combat it. But it does not follow from that that for short intervals of time you may not have a tyranny of a majority equal to the tyranny of any Czar or any Cæsar that ever existed.

The point of union between the Senator, or between his chief, at any rate—I do not know whether he completely understands the philosophy of his chief or not—and ancient Hamiltonians is that they both want a government unrestricted and unrestrained by constitutional limitations.

Why, the latest announcement of the Senator's chief was that he wanted to set aside a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, I beg your pardon; I beg your pardon. He wanted to set aside a decision of a State supreme court, not the Supreme Court of the United States. He wanted to set aside the decision of a State supreme court by submitting the decision to a plebiscite, one of the plebiscites of Napoleon the Third.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. No doubt the Senator was about to rise and correct me and say that he did not advocate submitting a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to a plebiscite.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That was not what I had in mind.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was going a bit too far for him. And yet, in logic and in common sense, if it is right to submit to a plebiscite a decision of the supreme court of a State, it is equally right to submit to a plebiscite a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very much surprised that the Senator from Mississippi shies so much at the idea of submitting to the people a constitutional question involving the decision of a court, as I have heard him so many times eulogize the political principles of Thomas Jefferson, who believed that the courts should not even have any power to declare unconstitutional a law of Congress.

There is another statement the Senator made that I should like to call attention to at the same time, if it will not interrupt him too much. It is due, apparently, to his being afraid of this name "new nationalism." I do not call it that. The Senator calls it that. It does not make any difference what we call it.

The Senator is inveighing against the rule of the majority. The cardinal principle of Thomas Jefferson's political philosophy was the rule of the majority, subject, of course, to constitutional restrictions. When the Senator says that the "new nationalism," or the Progressive Party, advocates an unconstitutional government its simply indicates that he does not understand Progressive principles.

Nobody is advocating the abolishment of constitutional restrictions. The greatest advocate of popular liberty in this country—and that is what the Progressives are advocating—framed the Bill of Rights of the Constitution. The Progressive Party would be the last, I believe, to abolish the Bill of Rights. I have not heard any suggestion tending in that direction. So the Senator puts the whole question upon a false ground when he says that they are in favor of setting aside all constitutional restrictions. They are not in favor of any such thing. There is nothing in the record of the party or any principle which they have ever advocated or adopted that indicates that they are in favor of setting aside all constitutional restrictions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let us see about that, Mr. President. Here is a man who comes upon the arena and who says that the decision of a court shall be set aside by plebiscite. I take it the Senator from Washington and I will agree that thus far the ex-President's utterance goes. If I am mistaken about that, I should like to be corrected.

Here is a man who comes upon the arena and says that the decision of a court shall be set aside by plebiscite. When? Under what circumstances? Whenever that decision is founded upon the opinion of the court to the effect that the law is unconstitutional. If I am mistaken about that, I should like to be corrected.

When a court decides that a given statute is invalid because it is unconstitutional, the court is, in the court's opinion, upholding a constitutional limitation. This knight of the twentieth century would set aside the constitutional limitation which the court has pronounced to exist regarding that particular act by virtue of the vote of the people in a plebiscite submitted to the people.

You go further. This election decides that the decision shall be reversed. There is no appeal from that election. Does it not necessarily follow, therefore, that you have set aside all constitutional limitations whenever a majority votes to set them aside? And is there any answer to that?

There is but one really novel feature in the American Government. Every other feature in it came either from our English forbears or from our colonial ancestors. That novel feature is that there shall be a written constitution which shall be the organic, fundamental law of the land, and that no other law not in pursuance of that, no other law in violation of that, shall be law at all.

Senators know that I almost worship Thomas Jefferson. My old grandfather said he took his religion and his politics both from him. I do not take my religion from him, but I do take my politics very largely from him. Very frequently they play on my passion for him by introducing irrelevant things to get me off on the subject of Thomas Jefferson. I shall not follow the Senator much upon that question; but when the Senator says that Thomas Jefferson said that the courts should have no power to set aside unconstitutional acts of Congress, I will give him six months to furnish the evidence to support his assertion.

What Thomas Jefferson complained about was not that the courts set aside unconstitutional acts but that they failed to set them aside. He complained that John Marshall undertook to make a constitution by judicial construction, and that, instead of abiding by the Constitution as it was written, he undertook to make a constitution by construction.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I shall be glad to furnish the evidence that the Senator calls for in much less than six months, in the form of Jefferson's written declarations on the subject and his well-known position.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator can produce a lot of things which, taken out of keeping with everything else, might have a tendency in that direction. For example, Jefferson once said that the Federal courts were "the sappers and miners of the Constitution." At another time he said that unless the powers of the courts were restrained the entire Federal Government and our system would go to pieces, although not in that exact language. The first language was his language, "the sappers and miners of the Constitution."

He fought the Federal judiciary all of his life, and the Federal judiciary fought him. His quarrel with the Federal judiciary, however, was not that it failed to set aside unconstitutional acts, but that it affirmed unconstitutional acts; in other words, that it undertook to create a constitution by construction. That was his quarrel with John Marshall in the Marbury-Madison case; that was his quarrel all the way through.

As I said a moment ago, it is becoming evident, even to my somewhat dense intellect, that Senators upon the other side now and then attempt to deflect me from the line of an argument by referring to Thomas Jefferson. It seems to be admitted that I have made myself his professional defender.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Now that the Senator has been deflected, I will not deflect him any further, except to agree that the logic of the Senator's statement that Jefferson objected, not to the courts setting aside unconstitutional laws but to their refusal to set aside constitutional laws, amounted simply to this, that Jefferson refused to accept the judgment of the courts as to which laws were constitutional and which were unconstitutional, and insisted on substituting either his own judgment or that of Congress for theirs. Jefferson even went so far as to refuse to submit to the decisions of the Supreme Court as to the constitutionality of acts of Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. O Mr. President, the Senator has now raised a totally different question. Of course, Jefferson refused to accept as his opinion the opinion of a court concerning a constitutional question. Andrew Jackson refused to do it. Everybody else has refused to do it. I refuse to do it right now. Abraham Lincoln refused to do it. Abraham Lincoln said that the only thing that the Dred Scott case settled was that Dred Scott was still a slave, but it could not settle any political question. That far, of course, Jefferson went. That far the Senator goes. That far I go. That far every man with common sense goes, unless he is a mere lawyer and nothing else; and the most dangerous man to free institutions is a mere lawyer and nothing else.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Especially if he is a constitutional lawyer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not admit for one minute that the opinion of the Supreme Court concerning a constitutional question binds me in my official capacity as a Senator. Jefferson did not admit that it bound him in his official capacity as a President. Andrew Jackson did not admit that it bound him in his official capacity as a President. He went so far as to say: "John Marshall has pronounced the decree of the court; now let him execute it."

In so far as the Senator is concerned, as a Senator, or I, or a man at the other end of the Capitol in the House of Representatives, we have sworn to maintain the Constitution, not according to the opinion of the Supreme Court, but according to our own. That is a totally different question. It has nothing to do with this one.

In the next place, the Senator said that Mr. Jefferson said that our duty was to submit to the rule of a majority. Why, the very difference between Jefferson and Rousseau was this: Rousseau said that the only free government was a government by a majority, and that even the English people were not free, because they were not free except once or twice in so many years, when they went to an election to elect representatives, and that that was not a free government nor a government of the people. Jefferson contended, upon the contrary, more strenuously than any man in America except Roger Williams, that there were limitations upon the power of majorities; that there were fields into which majorities must not enter at any time; that there were things of the first table between man and his Maker with which majorities had nothing to do. He contended for it to the last day of his life, and always. You will find in his inaugural address these words:

> The rule of the majority, in order to be binding, must be reasonable.

When he was contending for his own right to be President of the United States because he had been elected by the people, he worded it thus:

> He relied upon the voice of a majority, honestly and constitutionally expressed.

"Honestly and constitutionally expressed." What does that mean? That excluded the voice of the majority as to matters of the first table with which the majority had nothing to do, and it merely included the voice of the majority as to matters of the second table, and even in connection with that only when it was constitutionally expressed.

I did not intend to talk as long as this, but before I sit down I want to repeat that the longer any sensible man examines the theory of Roosevelt and the theory of Hamilton the more he will find that they are nearly identical. Of course, the one was advanced in one period of the world's history by arguments adapted to that period and the other is propounded in another period by arguments adapted to that period. But when you carry them back to the matter of utlimate analysis they amount to this: That majorities ought to be untrammeled, that there ought to be no sort of written constitutional restrictions upon them which they can not set aside by an election. In the first case the argument was that government ought to be sufficiently strong to withstand pressure from the people. In the second case it is that a majority of the people ought to be so strong as to withstand pressure from ethics, morals, constitutions, and anything else. They come back to the same point of an untrammeled, unlimited, unrestricted government, the only difference between them being as to who may constitute the government, and that is all.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, just one suggestion for one minute. It did not occur to me when I asked to have the opinion of Hamilton read for the benefit of the Senate that the mere mention of the name of Alexander Hamilton with Theodore Roosevelt automatically started the Senator from Mississippi in a denunciation of both those eminent men, and usually with a peroration eulogistic of Thomas Jefferson. But the Senator's historical reminiscences are always interesting.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not understand the Senator. Did the Senator say that I denounced either Alexander Hamilton or Roosevelt? I was confining myself to their opinions.

Mr. DIXON. I said the Senator's historical reminiscences are always interesting; but I think they always have to be taken from the viewpoint of the Senator from Mississippi. Jefferson was so anxious for majority rule that he proposed a new constitutional convention every 17 years. He said that each generation should have the right, and it should be executed, to override the fundamental basic law. When the Senator from Mississippi quotes some far-fetched suggestion of Alexander Hamilton regarding the Presidency, that he enunciated about the time of the Philadelphia convention, he will remember that Franklin, supported by several members of that convention, proposed a Presidency of three men, not united in one head. But that does not detract from the unanswered argument made by Hamilton in the article from the Federalist, which the Secretary read a few minutes ago, regarding the limitation of presidential power.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I now offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, strike out lines 4 to 10 in the amendment of the committee, and insert:

> The executive power shall be invested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of President after March 3, 1917, shall be six years, and no person elected for six years after the adoption of this amendment shall be eligible again to hold the office by election.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am going to ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment, without any particular discussion as far as I am concerned, for the reason that the question has been very thoroughly canvassed. I want to say, however, that my amendment is the shortest one that has been proposed, occupying only five lines; that it is without any ambiguity whatever; that it has not lengthened the term of President elect Wilson; that it does not exclude Wilson from reelection; that it does not exclude ex-President Roosevelt or President Taft from reelection; but merely establishes the principle hereafter, as a rule and part of the Constitution, that no man who has once occupied the office of President of the United States by election shall be eligible to reelection.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the brevity of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska is in its favor, but as I understand the effect of his amendment it would be to permit two parties occupying a prominent place in our politics to serve for 10 years and the other for 13.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that is not the proper way to state the matter.

Mr. BORAH. I am trying to state it as I understood it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that that is not a correct statement of the matter. It does not permit them to do so, and it does not forbid the people from selecting those men who have previously occupied office if they desire to do so.

My amendment, Mr. President, is designed to attach to the Constitution the intended reform in the fairest possible way, leaving to the American people the utmost possible freedom of judgment as far as these three particular individuals are concerned.

I think it rather inconsistent for the Senator from Idaho to object to this form of amendment, when it is less restrictive than the other form, and when the Senator is complaining of the other form because it is somewhat restrictive.

I think we can well trust the American people in the next few years to decide whether they desire to elect Roosevelt President or not. I think we can trust them to decide whether they desire to reelect President Taft or President-elect Wilson or not. We can at least afford to take our chances on those possibilities, which already exist, in order that we may engraft upon the Constitution this very desirable reform.

I wish to say to the Senator that it may be proper to vote against this amendment on principle, but I think it is hardly fair to oppose the amendment on the ground that it is intended to popularize it among the people.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was simply desirous of knowing whether or not this amendment had the effect which I thought it had, and I find now that it has that precise effect. But the Senator from Nebraska and I will agree that we may leave it to the people to select Col. Roosevelt again if they desire, or Mr. Wilson again if they desire, or Mr. Taft again if they desire. I have the same faith in posterity that I have in the present generation. For that reason I am willing to leave it to them to elect some future Roosevelt or Wilson or Taft again if they desire to do it. For that reason I am opposed to the whole affair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask to have the amendment to the amendment again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be again read.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 strike out lines 4 to 10, inclusive, in the amendment of the committee and insert:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of President after March 3, 1917, shall be six years, and no person elected for six years after the adoption of this amendment shall be eligible again to hold the office by election.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I am in favor of both propositions contained in this amendment, but I think it is unwise to submit both propositions together, because there are probably some Members of the Senate who are in favor of one but not in favor of the other.

If I understand the amendment, it proposes to accomplish two things—first, to prevent this resolution from being construed so as to extend the term of the President in office when the amendment is adopted, and, second, so as to permit persons otherwise ineligible under the general language of the resolution as now drawn to be eligible to the Presidency notwithstanding they have served in that office one or more terms in the past.

I think, Mr. President, that I shall ask to have the question divided, so that we may vote upon each separately; but before I do that I want to say a word or two in reference to the first branch of the amendment. It seems to me exceedingly desirable that that part of the amendment should be adopted, whether we adopt the second or not.

I was somewhat surprised yesterday when the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS], for whose legal judgment I have the utmost respect, stated that the resolution as reported to the Senate would have the effect, if adopted, of extending the presidential term of the President in office at the time it was adopted for two years longer. I understood the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] coincided in that view, and perhaps other Senators did the same.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. I infer from what the Senator says that he disagrees with me upon that legal proposition. Suppose that be so, does the Senator think we ought to send out this resolution to be voted upon with a degree of uncertainty as to the construction which should be placed upon it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; Mr. President, I intended to say before I finish, that I think it should not be sent out with that uncertainty. But I first want to state very briefly why I think the resolution in its present form is not susceptible of that construction. The joint resolution propcses, so far as this particular question is concerned, to amend the Constitution so that the term of office of the President shall be six years.

Now, the rule of construction is beyond all doubt that statutes, constitutions, municipal ordinances are all to be given a prospective effect and not a retrospective effect, unless provision is clearly made to the contrary. In other words, unless the statute contains terms clearly indicating that it shall be given a retroactive effect it must always be given a prospective effect only.

The doctrine was very clearly laid down by Lord Chief Justice Cockburn in the Second Law Reports of Queen's Bench Division, 269, in this language:

It is a general rule that where a statute is passed altering the law, unless the language is expressly to the contrary, it is to be taken as intended to apply to a state of facts coming into existence after the act.

The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly held that the rule applies to a constitution as well as to a statute.

In Shreveport v. Cole (129 U. S., 43) that court said:

Constitutions as well as statutes are construed to operate prospectively only, unless on the face of the instrument or enactment the contrary intention is manifest beyond reasonable question.

Now, the question is whether or not to hold this constitutional amendment to extend the term of office of the President in office at the time it shall be adopted would be to give it a retroactive effect. It seems to me clearly that it would. I call attention to what is said in Sutherland on Statutory Construction, in the second volume at page 1161:

It is always presumed that statutes were intended to operate prospectively, and all doubts are resolved in favor of such a construction. These same rules of construction apply to constitutional provisions and to by-laws and ordinances. A new constitutional provision as to the advanced age which should prevent the incumbents of certain judicial offices from retaining them was held prospective; it did not apply to persons in office at the time of its taking effect.

And again in section 643:

Acts changing the term of office or compensation of public officers were held not to apply to those in office.

And again on page 1163:

Where an act made provision for a pension for policemen who shall serve 20 years it was held to apply only where the 20 years' service was after the passage of the act.

Now, I call attention to a case which I think is very clearly in point, decided by the supreme court of my own State, the case of Farrel against Pingree, reported in Fifth Utah, page 443, the syllabus of which reads:

A statute will not be given a retrospective effect, unless its terms show clearly a legislative intention that it should operate restrospectively, and where an act amending an act relating to the terms of county treasurers substituted the words "two years" for the words "four years" a person elected to the office before the term of the incumbent who was elected and had served almost two years before the passage of the amendatory act had expired will not be entitled to the office as against the incumbent.

In other words, they hold that to give the statute that construction would be to give it a retroactive effect. In the course of the opinion the court says, on page 447:

There was no vacation of the office in express terms by the enactment of the 11th of March, 1886. The question then arises, Was there such a vacation by implication? There was no repeal of the act creating the office. The amendment dealt only with the length of the term of office. It left all the residue of the statute intact and in full force. If the legislature intended to vacate the office, that intention must clearly appear before a court is warranted in saying it exists. The defendant claims that such intent is shown in the enactment declaring that the old statute "is hereby amended by striking out the word 'four.'" But all that the striking-out clause vacates is the word "four." Nothing else is pretended in the act to be vacated. That word is dropped out of the statute, but the office is not dropped out. It is left to stand as it stood before.

Then, lower down:

He—

Meaning the county treasurer—

had been duly elected to it nearly two years prior to that time, had not been removed, nor had he resigned, and the office had not been abolished. Only the time limit had been removed. But the true rule of construction is to take the whole of a statute and consider all of its parts together, and not to take a fraction and consider that by itself. The amendatory enactment of the 11th of March, 1886, not only contained the words "striking out the word 'four,'" but it also contained the words "substituting the word 'two' in lieu thereof." The striking out and the substitution were simultaneous acts. With the word "two" in place of "four" we are to consider the effect of the change. There is no authority or sound reason for holding that such an amendment took effect as of August, 1884—nearly two years prior to its enactment.

So there could be no ground for holding here, if this constitutional amendment shall be adopted, that in reality it took effect at the beginning of the term of the incumbent of the office at the time the amendment was adopted.

The defendant contends that although the statute took effect on the day of its passage, yet that it related back to the August of 1884, the date of Harris's election. We are at a loss to know why this is so. The amendment says nothing whatever about the enactment relating back two years, or any other time, prior to its passage, and we see nothing in the amendment upon which to hang an inference of that nature. We are not justified in adding to a statute something that the legislature never intended or had in contemplation in enacting the statute. The legislature had the power to have said so; but we are not now considering the power of the legislature, we are simply considering whether they had exercised that power.

And on the following page I will insert in the RECORD still another extract from the opinion, without stopping now to read it:

It being clear, therefore, that the legislative intent that the amendment should be retrospective does not appear. It is settled by an overwhelming weight of authority that the enactment of the 11th of March, 1886, had no retrospective or retroactive effect, but its operation is entirely prospective. The well-nigh two years that Harris had held the office of county treasurer could not, therefore, be counted as part of the two years' term of office provided for in the amendment. The two years contemplated in the enactment were some two years to begin at a time subsequent to its passage. The amendment found Harris in office. It did not vacate his office nor abolish it. The amendment, if made applicable to him at all, simply told him that thereafter he could hold the office for two years. The word "thereafter" would, of course, mean after the amendment should go into effect, which would occur when there had been a publication of the enactment. (Comp. Laws, p. 78, sec. 2.) He would therefore be entitled to hold the office under the amendment, if it could apply to him, for the period of two years after publication of the amendment; and the time of such publication does not appear, nor is it material, as no doubt the publication took place shortly after its passage and prior to the general election in August, 1886. But as we have seen, if the amendment be at all applicable to Harris, he was under it authorized to hold the office two years following the enactment, and consequently the election of the defendants to the office at the general election in August, 1886, and before such two years had expired, was unauthorized by law. But the statute was in no way applicable to Harris. He held his office under a statute which had not been repealed, nor had it in any manner been modified, except that the term of office after its passage was to be two instead of four years, as theretofore. No reference was made to the cases of persons then in office. The statute was wholly prospective, and related to terms of office in the future.

In that case the change in the law was the converse of what is attempted to be made here—that is, it shortened the term instead of having lengthened it—but the rule of construction would be precisely the same because nobody has a vested right in an office. The legislature has exactly the same power to shorten the term that it has to extend it. It is purely a question of statutory construction as to whether it should be given a retroactive effect.

The only other case I desire to call attention to is the case of Greer against Asheville, reported in One hundred and fourteen North Carolina, page 678. I shall only stop to read the syllabus of that case:

> The term of office of a city marshal appointed under a charter providing that marshals should hold office during the official term of the aldermen is not enlarged from one to two years by an amendment to the charter extending the term of the aldermen from one to two years.

So, Mr. President, while I feel quite convinced that the resolution, if adopted, would not have the effect of extending the term of the then incumbent of the presidential office, at the same time I recognize that there are many lawyers who disagree with that construction, and it is quite reasonable to suppose that many others throughout the country may differ with it also.

That being so, it is of vast importance, as it seems to me, to make it perfectly clear just what we intend by this joint resolution. It is necessary that we should do that for two, to my mind, very sufficient reasons. First, if we do not make it clear, we will jeopardize, in my judgment, the adoption of this amendment by the people of the country. That reason, of course, will not appeal to those who are opposed to the joint resolution in any form. It ought to appeal to the friends of the joint resolution. It will jeopardize it in this way: Doubt will be suggested as to whether the effect of the joint resolution will be to extend the term of President Wilson, if he should happen to be in office, and many members of the legislatures will be unwilling to bring about that result.

I am perfectly free to say that, so far as I am concerned, I consider it a matter of no great consequence in the adoption of this great fundamental principle whether we extend the term of President Wilson or any other man two years. I care very little about that, but there are many people in the country who will care much about it; and when that question is presented to the various legislatures of the States it will be a makeweight against the adoption of the amendment. It seems to me that for that reason the friends of this measure ought to be willing to make it perfectly certain that it is not intended to have that result.

Now, the second objection to leaving it uncertain, and to my mind it is a more serious objection than the one which I have discussed, is that if the joint resolution shall be adopted in its present form the matter will still be left in doubt as to whether it operates to extend the term of the then incumbent, and we shall have the question presented to us whether we shall hold an election in 1916 or 1918, whether the incumbent of the office at that time shall continue to hold for two years longer or shall go out of office on the 4th of March, 1917. We can all see that that may result not only in a serious dispute, which would be exceedingly unfortunate, but that, in some state of the public mind, which may exist at that time, it may result in great disturbance and in a situation the gravity of which we can not foresee.

We do not know what dispute it may lead to; we do not know how serious the dispute may be; and we do not know what serious results may flow from the dispute. For both of these reasons, it seems to me to be of the utmost importance that we should make it perfectly clear that we do not intend, in the resolution, to extend the term of any President who is in office, whoever he may happen to be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask for a division of the question as indicated by me.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order that it can not be divided. It is a motion to strike out and insert.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have to sustain the point of order under Rule 18:

> If the question in debate contains several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided, except a motion to strike out and insert, which shall not be divided.

The pending amendment is a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate by any discussion of the legal question that has been raised by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] because of the fact that we are so thoroughly agreed as to the duty of the Senate to make the resolution so clear and plain that there can be no question of construction with reference to it. I have the very highest regard for the opinion of the Senator from Utah upon this or any other legal question, but I think he overlooks the fact that by this resolution the term of six years is fixed. There can be no other term. Therefore I think the resolution applies directly to the term which exists at the present time and extends it. But I am not going to emphasize my views upon that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska demands the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I transfer the general pair I have with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I make this announcement for the day. I vote "yea."

Mr. DU PONT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. As he is absent from the Chamber and I have no means of knowing how he would vote if present, I will withhold my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). The Senator from New Hampshire is paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE] is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. GARDNER]. By consent, a transfer will be made whereby the Senator from New York and the Senator from Massachusetts will stand paired and that will permit the Senator from Maine and me to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I announce my general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], and in his absence will refrain from voting.

Mr. RICHARDSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when Mr. REED's name was called). I have been handed a telegram from the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], stating that he is detained at home on account of sickness in his family, and that if he were here he would vote against the presidential term limited to six years. He is paired with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. ROOT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSTON], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CHILTON (when Mr. WATSON's name was called). I announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. WATSON] with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. On all votes to-day I transfer the general pair which I have with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. MASSEY], and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BRISTOW. I am requested to announce that the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] is paired with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] and that the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is paired with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS].

Mr. CHILTON. I have a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], but an arrangement has been made, which has been announced, for the transfer of that pair, so that I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. ASHURST. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] is absent on business of the Senate, and that he is paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. BRYAN. I have been requested to state that the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSTON] is absent on business of the Senate, and, as has been stated, is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—27.

Ashurst	Fletcher	Newlands	Sutherland
Bryan	Gardner	Oliver	Swanson

So Mr. HITCHCOCK's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, on page 2, to strike out lines 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 of the amendment of the committee and to insert:

> The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of President shall be four years. He shall be reeligible for one additional term of four years, and not thereafter reeligible at any time. No person who shall hereafter hold the office or discharge its powers or duties, or act as President by succession for any fraction of a term under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof, shall be reeligible beyond such a fraction of a term and for one term by election.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this amendment has two salient points in it. The first is to write into the Constitution what has hitherto been regarded as the unwritten law. The second point is to eliminate from the controversy all possible personal issues by making the amendment take effect prospectively altogether and retrospectively not at all, so that every citizen of the United States, after this amendment passes, will stand upon an equal footing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from Mississippi to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendment to be offered as in Committee of the Whole, the question is on agreeing to the amendment to the joint resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I sent to the desk a few moments ago an amendment which I should like the Secretary to read now, and I will offer it. Then I should like to have the Secretary read an amendment, which I understand has been sent to the desk by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], on the same subject, as I want to see which I like best.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks for the reading of his proposed amendment. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 10, after the word "election," in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, it is proposed to insert:

> The provision of this proposed amendment concerning the term of office shall affect the term of office of Presidents hereafter elected only.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] be also read. If agreeable to the Senator from Utah, that will be done.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 10, after the word "election," in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, it is proposed to insert:

> Provided, That the foregoing shall not operate to extend the term of the President in office at the time this amendment is adopted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. May I ask the Senator from Utah a question? If this proposed constitutional amendment should not be ratified for six or eight years, would not the Senator want this six-year term to apply to the President who might then be in office?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; the very purpose of the proposed amendment is to make it clear that it shall not apply to the President in office; that no matter when the amendment is adopted it should not so apply.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the amendment were adopted and a man were elected President after the amendment was the law of the land, why ought it not to apply?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Because it would be giving it a retroactive effect.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not follow the Senator in that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My whole position about it is that, no matter when this amendment shall be adopted, if it be 10 years from now, we will find some President in office, and there will then be a doubt as to whether it operates to extend the office of that President or whether it does not. It is of vast importance, as it seems to me, to settle that doubt in this joint resolution, to make it perfectly clear either that we do intend to extend the term of the incumbent at the time it is adopted or that we do not so intend—one thing or the other. That necessity will be just as great in 10 years as it will be in 2 years. We shall always find some President in office.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will ask that the amendment which I proposed be again stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut will be again stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 10, after the word "election," in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, it is proposed to insert:

> The provision of this proposed amendment concerning the term of office shall affect the term of office of Presidents hereafter elected only.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as a friend of the main proposition, I wish to say that, while the object of the Senator from Connecticut is identical apparently with the object of the Senator from Utah, it seems to me that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will accomplish the object more perfectly and certainly than would the one proposed by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In view of that statement, if the Senator from Iowa is of that opinion, I will withdraw my proposed amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut withdraws his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 10, after the word "election," it is proposed to amend the amendment by inserting:

> Provided, That the foregoing shall not operate to extend the term of the President in office at the time this amendment is adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. GALLINGER'S name was called). The present occupant of the chair has a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], which he transfers to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE]. The occupant of the chair votes "nay."

Mr. RICHARDSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. ROOT (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSTON] and withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DU PONT. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. He is absent from the Chamber, and I therefore withhold my vote. If I were free to vote, I should vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] is paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] and that they are both absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. CHILTON. I have just been informed that the arrangement as to the transfer of my pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] stands for this vote also, and I therefore desire to vote. I vote "nay."

While I am on my feet, I desire to make the same announcement as to my colleague [Mr. WATSON] as on the previous roll call.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 38, as follows:

YEAS—29.

Ashurst	Dillingham	Nelson	Sanders
Brandegee	Gamble	Oliver	Smoot

So Mr. SUTHERLAND's amendment to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DIXON. I ask that the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, on page 1, line 9, after the words "as follows," to strike out:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of six years and shall be ineligible to a second term, and, together with the Vice President, who shall hold for a like term, and shall also be ineligible to a second term, be elected as follows:

And in lieu thereof insert:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. The term of the office of President shall be six years; and no person who has held the office by election, or discharged its powers or duties, or acted as President under the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof shall be eligible to hold again the office by election.

The President, together with a Vice President chosen for the same term, shall be elected as follows:

The amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Constitution requires this joint resolution to be adopted by a two-thirds vote, I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that upon the question of the passage of the joint resolution a two-thirds vote is required. The Senator from Iowa demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRISTOW (when Mr. CRAWFORD's name was called). I am requested to state that upon this vote the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] is paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE].

Mr. DU PONT. I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and withhold my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). The occupant of the chair again announces his pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. He transfers that pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE]. The Chair is informed that if those two Senators were present the Senator from New York would vote "yea" and the Senator from Massachusetts "nay." The Chair votes "nay."

Mr. GARDNER (when his name was called). Under the announcement just made by the Chair, I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LIPPITT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. On questions involving a two-thirds vote, by agreement with him I am relieved from that pair, and therefore I vote "nay."

Mr. SWANSON (when the name of Mr. MARTIN of Virginia was called). My colleague [Mr. MARTIN of Virginia] is detained from the Senate on account of sickness. As stated by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], my colleague is paired with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. RICHARDSON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. ROOT (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSTON] and withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I vote "yea." While on my feet, I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has been detained until to-day at home by sickness in his family. He hopes to be here to-morrow.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I desire to state that the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is absent on business and is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. KERN (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). I desire again to state that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably absent on account of illness in his family.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when the name of Mr. WARREN was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. WARREN]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. CHILTON (when Mr. WATSON's name was called). I again announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BRIGGS].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SANDERS. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA].

Mr. SIMMONS. I have been requested to state that the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. If the Senator from Texas were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea."

Mr. DU PONT. In view of the statement just made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. ASHURST. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] are both absent from the Senate on business of the Senate, and that those Senators are paired. If present the Senator from Montana would vote "yea," and the Senator from North Dakota would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 47, nays 23, as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the final passage of the joint resolution the yeas are 47 and the nays are 23. More than two-thirds of the Senators present having voted in the affirmative, the joint resolution is passed.

IMMIGRATION OF ALIENS.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the bill (S. 3175) entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States" having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out the text inserted by the House amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the word 'alien' wherever used in this act shall include any person not a native-born or naturalized citizen of the United States; but this definition shall not be held to include Indians not taxed or citizens of the islands under the jurisdiction of the United States. That the term 'United States' as used in the title as well as in the various sections of this act shall be construed to mean the United States and any waters, territory, or other place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, except the Isthmian Canal Zone; but if any alien shall leave the Canal Zone and attempt to enter any other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, nothing contained in this act shall be construed as permitting him to enter under any other conditions than those applicable to all aliens. That the term 'seamen' as used in this act shall include every person signed on the ship's articles and employed in any capacity on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place.

"That this act shall be enforced in the Philippine Islands by officers of the General Government thereof designated by appropriate legislation of said Government.

"SEC. 2. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a tax of $5 for every alien, including alien seamen regularly admitted as provided in this act, entering the United States. The said tax shall be paid to the collector of customs of the port or customs district to which said alien shall come, or, if there be no collector at such port or district, then to the collector nearest thereto, by the master, agent, owner, or consignee of the vessel, transportation line, or other conveyance or vehicle bringing such alien to the United States, or by the alien himself if he does not come by a vessel, transportation line, or other conveyance or vehicle. The tax imposed by this section shall be a lien upon the vessel or other vehicle of carriage or transportation bringing such aliens to the United States, and shall be a debt in favor of the United States against the owner or owners of such vessel or other vehicle, and the payment of such tax may be enforced by any legal or equitable remedy. That the said tax shall not be levied on account of aliens who have in accordance with law declared their intention of becoming citizens of the United States or on account of aliens who shall enter the United States after an uninterrupted residence of at least one year, immediately preceding such entrance, in the Dominion of Canada, Newfoundland, the Republic of Cuba, or the Republic of Mexico, nor on account of otherwise admissible residents of any possession of the United States, nor on account of aliens in transit through the United States, nor upon aliens who have been lawfully admitted to the United States and who later shall go in transit from one part of the United States to another through foreign contiguous territory: Provided, That the Commissioner General of Immigration, under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, by agreement with transportation lines, as provided in section 23 of this act, may arrange in some other manner for the payment of the tax imposed by this section upon any or all aliens seeking admission from foreign contiguous territory: Provided further, That said tax, when levied upon aliens entering the Philippine Islands, shall be paid into the treasury of said islands, to be expended for the benefit of such islands: Provided further, That in the cases of aliens applying for admission from foreign contiguous territory and rejected, the head tax collected shall upon application be refunded to the alien: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to aliens arriving in Guam or Hawaii; but if any such alien, not having become a citizen of the United States, shall later arrive at any port or place of the United States on the North American Continent the provisions of this section shall apply.

"SEC. 3. That the following classes of aliens shall be excluded from admission into the United States: All idiots, imbeciles, feeble-minded persons, epileptics, insane persons, and persons who have been insane within five years previous; persons who have had one or more attacks of insanity at any time previously; paupers; persons likely to become a public charge; professional beggars; vagrants; persons afflicted with tuberculosis in any form or with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease; persons not comprehended within any of the foregoing excluded classes who are found to be and are certified by the examining surgeon as being mentally or physically defective, such mental or physical defect being of a nature which may affect the ability of such alien to earn a living; persons who have been convicted of or admit having committed a felony or other crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude; polygamists, or persons who admit their belief in the practice of polygamy; anarchists, or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or of all forms of law, or who disbelieve in or are opposed to organized government, or who advocate the assassination of public officials; persons who are members of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or who advocate or teach the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character; prostitutes, or women or girls coming into the United States for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose; persons who procure or attempt to bring in prostitutes or women or girls for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose; persons who are supported by or receive in whole or in part the proceeds of prostitution; persons hereinafter called contract laborers, who have been induced, assisted, encouraged, or solicited to migrate to this country by offers or promises of employment, whether such offers or promises are true or false, or in consequence of agreements, oral, written or printed, express or implied, to perform labor in this country of any kind, skilled or unskilled; persons who have come in consequence of advertisements for laborers printed, published, or distributed in a foreign country; persons who have been deported under any of the provisions of this act, and who may again seek admission within one year from the date of such deportation, unless prior to their reembarkation at a foreign port, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall have consented to their reapplying for admission; persons whose ticket or passage is paid for with the money of another, or who is assisted by others to come, unless it is affirmatively and satisfactorily shown that such person does not belong to one of the foregoing excluded classes; persons whose ticket or passage is paid for by any corporation, association, society, municipality, or foreign Government, either directly or indirectly; stowaways, except that any such stowaway may be admitted in the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor; all children under 16 years of age, unaccompanied by one or both of their parents, at the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor or under such regulations as he may from time to time prescribe; persons who can not become eligible, under existing law, to become citizens of the United States by naturalization, unless otherwise provided for by existing agreements as to passports, or by treaties, conventions, or agreements that may hereafter be entered into. The provision next foregoing, however, shall not apply to persons of the following status or occupations: Government officers, ministers or religious teachers, missionaries, lawyers, physicians, chemists, engineers, teachers, students, authors, editors, journalists, merchants, bankers, and travelers for curiosity or pleasure, nor to their legal wives or their children under 16 years of age who shall accompany them or who subsequently may apply for admission to the United States, but such persons or their legal wives or foreign-born children who fail to maintain in the United States a status or occupation placing them within the excepted classes shall be deemed to be in the United States contrary to law, and shall be subject to deportation as provided in section 19 of this act.

"That after four months from the approval of this act, in addition to the aliens who are by law now excluded from admission into the United States, the following persons shall also be excluded from admission thereto, to wit:

"All aliens over 16 years of age, physically capable of reading, who can not read the English language or some other language or dialect, including Hebrew or Yiddish: Provided, That any admissible alien or any alien heretofore or hereafter legally admitted or any citizen of the United States may bring in or send for his father or grandfather over 55 years of age, his wife, his mother, his grandmother, or his unmarried or widowed daughter, if otherwise admissible, whether such relative can read or not; and such relatives shall be permitted to enter. That for the purpose of ascertaining whether aliens can read the immigrant inspectors shall be furnished with slips of uniform size, prepared under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, each containing not less than 30 nor more than 40 words in ordinary use, printed in plainly legible type in the various languages and dialects of immigrants. Each alien may designate the particular language or dialect in which he desires the examination to be made, and shall be required to read the words printed on the slip in such language or dialect. No two aliens coming in the same vessel or other vehicle of carriage or transportation shall be tested with the same slip. That the following classes of persons shall be exempt from the operation of the illiteracy test, to wit: All aliens who shall prove to the satisfaction of the proper immigration officer or to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that they are seeking admission to the United States solely for the purpose of escaping from religious persecution; all aliens in transit through the United States; all aliens who have been lawfully admitted to the United States and who later shall go in transit from one part of the United States to another through foreign contiguous territory: Provided, That nothing in this act shall exclude, if otherwise admissible, persons convicted of an offense purely political, not involving moral turpitude: Provided further, That the provisions of this act relating to the payments for tickets or passage by any corporation, association, society, municipality, or foreign government shall not apply to the tickets or passage of aliens in immediate and continuous transit through the United States to foreign contiguous territory: Provided further, That skilled labor, if otherwise admissible, may be imported if labor of like kind unemployed can not be found in this country, and the question of the necessity of importing such skilled labor in any particular instance may be determined by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor upon the application of any person interested, such application to be made before such importation, and such determination by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to be reached after a full hearing and an investigation into the facts of the case; but such determination shall not become final until a period of 30 days has elapsed. Within 3 days after such determination the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall cause to be published a brief statement reciting the substance of the application, the facts presented at the hearing, and his determination thereon in three daily newspapers of general circulation in three of the principal cities of the United States. At any time during said period of 30 days any person dissatisfied with the ruling may appeal to the district court of the United States of the district into which the labor is sought to be brought, which court or the judge thereof in vacation shall have jurisdiction to try de novo such question of necessity, and the decision in such court shall be final. Such appeal shall operate as a supersedeas: Provided further, That the provisions of this law applicable to contract labor shall not be held to exclude professional actors, artists, lecturers, singers, ministers of any religious denomination, professors for colleges or seminaries, persons belonging to any recognized learned profession, or persons employed strictly as personal or domestic servants: Provided further, That whenever the President shall be satisfied that passports issued by any foreign government to its citizens or subjects to go to any country other than the United States or to any insular possession of the United States or to the Canal Zone are being used for the purpose of enabling the holder to come to the continental territory of the United States to the detriment of labor conditions therein, the President shall refuse to permit such citizens or subjects of the country issuing such passports to enter the continental territory of the United States from such other country or from such insular possessions or from the Canal Zone: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent, hinder, or restrict any alien exhibitor or holder of a concession or privilege for any fair or exposition authorized by act of Congress from bringing into the United States, under contract, such alien mechanics, artisans, agents, or other employees, natives of his country, as may be necessary for installing or conducting his exhibit or for preparing for installing or conducting any business authorized or permitted under any concession or privilege which may have been or may be granted by any such fair or exposition in connection therewith, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, may prescribe both as to the admission and return of such persons: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to accredited officials of foreign governments nor to their suites, families, or guests: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall exclude the wife or minor children of a citizen of the United States.

"SEC. 4. That the importation into the United States of any alien for the purpose of prostitution, or for any other immoral purpose, is hereby forbidden; and whoever shall, directly or indirectly, import, or attempt to import, into the United States any alien for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose, or shall hold or attempt to hold any alien for any such purpose in pursuance of such illegal importation, or shall keep, maintain, control, support, employ, or harbor in any house or other place, for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose, any alien, in pursuance of such illegal importation, shall in every such case be deemed guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not more than 10 years and by a fine of not more than $5,000. Jurisdiction for the trial and punishment of the felonies hereinbefore set forth shall be in any district to or into which said alien is brought in pursuance of said importation by the person or persons accused, or in any district in which a violation of any of the foregoing provisions of this section occur. That any alien who shall, after he has been excluded and deported or arrested and deported in pursuance of the provisions of this act which relate to prostitutes, procurers, or other like immoral persons, attempt thereafter to return to or to enter the United States shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not more than two years. In all prosecutions under this section the testimony of a husband or wife shall be admissible and competent evidence against a wife or husband.

"SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful for any person, company, partnership, or corporation, in any manner whatsoever, to prepay the transportation or in any way to induce, assist, encourage, or solicit the importation or migration of any contract laborer or contract laborers into the United States, unless such contract laborer or contract laborers are exempted under the provisions of section 3 of this act, and for every violation of any of the provisions of this section the person, partnership, company, or corporation violating the same shall forfeit and pay for every such offense the sum of $1,000, which may be sued for and recovered by the United States, or by any person who shall first bring his action therefor in his own name and for his own benefit, including any such aliens thus offered or promised employment as aforesaid, as debts of like amount are now recovered in the courts of the United States; or for every violation of the provisions hereof the person violating the same may be prosecuted in a criminal action for a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term of not less than six months nor more than two years; and under either the civil or the criminal procedure mentioned separate suits or prosecutions may be brought for each alien thus offered or promised employment as aforesaid.

"SEC. 6. That it shall be unlawful and be deemed a violation of section 5 of this act to induce, assist, encourage, or solicit any alien to come into the United States by promise of employment through advertisements printed, published, or distributed in any foreign country, whether such promise is true or false, and either the civil or the criminal penalty imposed by said section shall be applicable to such a case: Provided, That States or Territories, the District of Columbia, or places subject to the jurisdiction of the United States may advertise, and by written or oral communication with prospective alien settlers make known, the inducements they offer for immigration thereto, respectively.

"SEC. 7. That it shall be unlawful for any person, association, society, company, partnership, corporation, or others engaged in the business of transporting aliens to the United States, including owners, masters, officers, and agents of vessels, directly or indirectly, by writing, printing, or oral representation, to solicit, invite, or encourage any alien to come into the United States, and anyone violating any provision hereof shall be subject to either the civil or the criminal prosecution prescribed by section 5 of this act; or if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that any owner, master, officer, or agent of a vessel has brought or caused to be brought to a port of the United States any alien so solicited, invited, or encouraged to come by such owner, master, officer, or agent, such owner, master, officer, or agent shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located or in which any vessel of the line may be found the sum of $400 for each and every such violation; and no vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while the fine imposed remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such questions upon the deposit with the collector of customs of a sum sufficient to cover such fine: Provided further, That whenever it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that the provisions of this section are persistently violated by or on behalf of any transportation company, it shall be the duty of said Secretary to deny to such company the privilege of landing alien immigrant passengers of any or all classes at United States ports for such a period as in his judgment may be necessary to insure an observance of such provisions: Provided further, That this section shall not be held to prevent transportation companies from issuing letters, circulars, or advertisements, confined strictly to stating the sailings of their vessels and terms and facilities of transportation therein.

"SEC. 8. That any person, including the master, agent, owner, or consignee of any vessel, who shall bring into or land in the United States, by vessel or otherwise, or shall attempt, by himself or through another, to bring into or land in the United States, by vessel or otherwise, or shall conceal or harbor, or attempt to conceal or harbor, or assist or abet another to conceal or harbor in any place, including any building, vessel, railway car, conveyance, or vehicle, any alien not duly admitted by an immigrant inspector or not lawfully entitled to enter or to reside within the United States under the terms of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment for each and every alien so landed or brought in or attempted to be landed or brought in.

"SEC. 9. That it shall be unlawful for any person, including any transportation company other than railway lines entering the United States from foreign contiguous territory, or the owner, master, agent, or consignee of any vessel, to bring to the United States any alien afflicted with idiocy, insanity, imbecility, epilepsy, tuberculosis in any form, or a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was afflicted with any of the said diseases or disabilities at the time of foreign embarkation, and that the existence of such disease or disability might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person or transportation company, or the master, agent, owner, or consignee of any such vessel, shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $200 for each and every violation of the provisions of this section. It shall also be unlawful for any such person to bring to any port of the United States any alien afflicted with any mental or physical defect of a nature which may affect his ability to earn a living, as contemplated in section 3 of this act, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that any alien so brought to the United States was so afflicted at the time of foreign embarkation, and that the existence of such mental or physical defect might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time, such person shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $25 for each and every violation of this provision. It shall also be unlawful for any such person to bring to any port of the United States any alien who is excluded by the provisions of section 3 of this act because unable to read or who can not become eligible, under existing law, to become a citizen of the United States by naturalization, as provided in section 3 of this act, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that these disabilities might have been detected by the exercise of reasonable precaution prior to the departure of such aliens from a foreign port such person shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $100 for each and every violation of this provision. And no vessel shall be granted clearance papers pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while the fine remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such questions upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine and costs, such sum to be named by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

"SEC. 10. That it shall be the mandatory and unqualified duty of every person, including owners, officers, and agents of vessels or transportation lines, other than those lines which may enter into a contract as provided in section 23 of this act, bringing an alien to any seaport or land border port of the United States to prevent the landing of such alien in the United States at any time or place other than as designated by the immigration officers, and the failure of any such owner, officer, or agent to comply with the foregoing requirements shall be deemed a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine in each case of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment; or, if in the opinion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor it is impracticable or inconvenient to prosecute the owner, master, officer, or agent of any such vessel, a pecuniary penalty of $1,000 shall be a lien upon the vessel whose owner, master, officer, or agent, violates the provisions of this section, and such vessel shall be libeled therefor in the appropriate United States court.

"SEC. 11. That whenever he may deem such action necessary the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may, at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, detail immigrant inspectors and matrons of the United States Immigration Service for duty on vessels carrying immigrant or emigrant passengers, or passengers other than first and second cabin passengers, between ports of the United States and foreign ports. On such voyages said inspectors and matrons shall remain in that part of the vessel where immigrant passengers are carried. It shall be the duty of such inspectors and matrons to observe such passengers during the voyage, and report to the immigration authorities in charge at the port of landing any information of value in determining the admissibility of such passengers under the laws regulating immigration of aliens into the United States. It shall further be the duty of such inspectors and matrons to observe violations of the provisions of such laws and the violation of such provisions of the "passenger act" of August 2, 1882, as amended, as relate to the care and treatment of immigrant passengers at sea, and report the same to the proper United States officials at ports of landing. Whenever the Secretary of Commerce and Labor so directs, a surgeon of the United States Public Health Service detailed to the Immigration Service, not lower in rank than a passed assistant surgeon, shall be received and carried on any vessel transporting immigrant or emigrant passengers, or passengers other than first and second cabin passengers, between ports of the United States and foreign ports. Such surgeon shall be permitted to investigate and examine the condition of all immigrant and emigrant passengers in relation to any provisions of the laws regulating the immigration of aliens into the United States and such provisions of the "passenger act" of August 2, 1882, as amended, as relate to the care and treatment of immigrant passengers at sea, and shall immediately report any violation of said laws to the master or commanding officer of the vessel, and shall also report said violations to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor within 24 hours after the arrival of the vessel at the port of entry in the United States. Such surgeon shall accompany the master or captain of the vessel in his visits to the sanitary officers of the ports of call during the voyage, and, should contagious or infectious diseases prevail at any port where passengers are received, he shall request all reasonable precautionary measures for the health of persons on board. Such surgeon on arrival at ports of the United States shall also, if requested by the examining board, furnish any information he may possess in regard to immigrants arriving on the vessel to which he has been detailed. While on duty such surgeons shall wear the prescribed uniform of their service and shall be provided with first-class accommodations on such vessel at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. For every violation of this section any person, including any transportation company, owning or operating the vessel in which such violation occurs shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the next United States port of arrival is located the sum of $1,000 for each and every day during which such violation continues, the term "violation" to include the refusal of any person having authority so to do to permit any such immigrant inspector, matron, or surgeon to be received on board such vessel, as provided in this section, and also the refusal of the master or commanding officer of any such vessel to permit the inspection and visits of any such surgeon as provided in this section, and no vessel shall be granted clearance papers pending the determination of the question of the liability of such fine, or while it remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of all such questions upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine and costs, such sum to be named by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

"SEC. 12. That upon the arrival of any alien by water at any point within the United States on the North American Continent from a foreign port or a port of the Philippine Islands, Guam, Porto Rico, or Hawaii, or at any port of the said insular possessions from any foreign port, from a port in the United States on the North American Continent, or from a port of another insular possession of the United States, it shall be the duty of the master or commanding officer, owners or consignees of the steamer, sailing, or other vessel having said alien on board to deliver to the immigration officers at the port of arrival lists or manifests made at the time and place of embarkation of such alien on board such steamer or vessel, which shall, in answer to questions at the top of said list, contain full and accurate information as to each alien as follows: Full name, age, and sex; whether married or single; calling or occupation, personal description (including height, complexion, color of hair and eyes, and marks of identification); whether able to read; nationality; country of birth; race; country of last permanent residence; name and address of the nearest relative in the country from which the alien came; seaport for landing in the United States; final destination, if any, beyond the port of landing; whether having a ticket through to such final destination; by whom passage was paid; whether going to join a relative or friend, and if so, what relative or friend, and his or her name and complete address; whether ever before in the United States, and if so, when and where; whether ever in prison or almshouse or an institution or hosiptal for the care and treatment of the insane or supported by charity; whether a polygamist; whether an anarchist; whether a person who believes in or advocates the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law, or who disbelieves in or is opposed to organized government, or who advocates the assassination of public officials, or is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or who advocates or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character; whether coming by reason of any offer, solicitation, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to perform labor in the United States; the alien's condition of health, mental and physical; whether deformed or crippled, and if so, for how long and from what cause; and such master or commanding officer, owners, or consignees shall also furnish information in relation to the sex, age, class of travel, and the foreign port of embarkation of arriving passengers who are United States citizens. That it shall further be the duty of the master or commanding officer of every vessel taking passengers from any port of the United States on the North American Continent to a foreign port or a port of the Philippine Islands, Guam, Porto Rico, or Hawaii, or from any port of the said insular possession to any foreign port, to a port of the United States on the North American Continent, or to a port of another insular possession of the United States to file with the immigration officials before departure a list which shall contain full and accurate information in relation to the following matters regarding all alien passengers, and all citizens of the United States or insular possessions of the United States departing with the stated intent to reside permanently in a foreign country, taken on board: Name, age, and sex; whether married or single; calling or occupation; whether able to read; nationality; country of birth; country of which citizen or subject; race; last permanent residence in the United States or insular possessions thereof; if a citizen of the United States or of the insular possessions thereof, whether native born or naturalized; intended future permanent residence; and time and port of last arrival in the United States, or insular possessions thereof; and such master or commanding officer shall also furnish information in relation to the sex, age, class of travel, and port of debarkation of the United States citizens departing who do not intend to reside permanently in a foreign country, and no master of any such vessel shall be granted clearance papers for his vessel until he has deposited such list or lists with the immigration officials at the port of departure and made oath that they are full and complete as to the name and other information herein required concerning each person of the classes specified taken on board his vessel; and any neglect or omission to comply with the requirements of this section shall be punishable as provided in section 14 of this act: Provided, That in the case of vessels making regular trips to ports of the United States the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, may, when expedient, arrange for the delivery of such lists of outgoing aliens at a later date: Provided further, That it shall be the duty of immigration officials to record the following information regarding every resident alien and citizen leaving the United States by way of the Canadian or Mexican borders for permanent residence in a foreign country: Name, age, and sex; whether married or single; calling or occupation; whether able to read; nationality; country of birth; country of which citizen or subject; race; last permanent residence in the United States; intended future permanent residence; and time and port of last arrival in the United States; and if a United States citizen, whether native born or naturalized.

"SEC. 13. That all aliens arriving by water at the ports of the United States shall be listed in convenient groups, the names of those coming from the same locality to be assembled so far as practicable, and no one list or manifest shall contain more than thirty names. To each alien or head of a family shall be given a ticket on which shall be written his name, a number or letter designating the list in which his name, and so forth, are contained, and his number on said list, for convenience of identification on arrival. Each list or manifest shall be verified by the signature and the oath or affirmation of the master or commanding officer, or the first or second below him in command, taken before an immigration officer at the port of arrival, to the effect that he has caused the surgeon of said vessel sailing therewith to make a physical and oral examination of each of said aliens, and that from the report of said surgeon and from his own investigation he believes that no one of said aliens is of any of the classes excluded from admission into the United States by section 3 of this act, and that also according to the best of his knowledge and belief, the information in said lists or manifests concerning each of said aliens named therein is correct and true in every respect. That the surgeon of said vessel sailing therewith shall also sign each of said lists or manifests and make oath or affirmation in like manner before an immigration officer at the port of arrival, stating his professional experience and qualifications as a physician and surgeon, and that he has made a personal examination of each of the said aliens named therein, and that the said list or manifest, according to the best of his knowledge and belief, is full, correct, and true in all particulars relative to the mental and physical condition of said aliens. If no surgeon sails with any vessel bringing aliens, the mental and physical examinations and the verifications of the lists or manifests shall be made by some competent surgeon employed by the owners of the said vessels, and the manifests shall be verified by such surgeon before a United States consular officer.

"SEC. 14. That it shall be unlawful for the master or commanding officer of any vessel bringing aliens into or carrying aliens out of the United States to refuse or fail to deliver to the immigration officials the accurate and full manifests or statements or information regarding all aliens on board or taken on board such vessel required by this act, and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that there has been such a refusal or failure, or that the lists delivered are not accurate and full, such master or commanding officer shall pay to the collector of customs at the port of arrival or departure the sum of $10 for each alien concerning whom such accurate and full manifest or statement or information is not furnished, or concerning whom the manifest or statement or information is not prepared and sworn to as prescribed by this act. No vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine, or while it remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit with the collector of customs of a sum sufficient to cover such fine.

"SEC. 15. That upon the arrival at a port of the United States of any vessel bringing aliens it shall be the duty of the proper immigration officials to go or to send competent assistants to the vessel and there inspect all such aliens, or said immigration officials may order a temporary removal of such aliens for examination at a designated time and place, but such temporary removal shall not be considered a landing, nor shall it relieve the transportation lines, masters, agents, owners, or consignees of the vessel upon which said aliens are brought to any port of the United States from any of the obligations which, in case such aliens remain on board, would, under the provisions of this act bind the said transportation lines, masters, agents, owners, or consignees: Provided, That where removal is made to premises owned or controlled by the United States, said transportation lines, masters, agents, owners, or consignees, and each of them shall, so long as detention there lasts, be relieved of responsibility for the safekeeping of such aliens. Whenever a temporary removal of aliens is made the transportation lines which brought them and the masters, owners, agents, and consignees of the vessel upon which they arrive shall pay all expenses of such removal and all expenses arising during subsequent detention, pending decision on the aliens' eligibility to enter the United States and until they are either allowed to land or returned to the care of the line or to the vessel which brought them, such expenses to include those of maintenance, medical treatment in hospital or elsewhere, burial in the event of death, and transfer to the vessel in the event of deportation, excepting only where they arise under the terms of any of the provisos of section 18 hereof. Any refusal or failure to comply with the provisions hereof to be punished in the manner specified in section 18 of this act.

"SEC. 16. That the physical and mental examination of all arriving aliens shall be made by medical officers of the United States Public Health Service who shall have had at least two years' experience in the practice of their profession since receiving the degree of doctor of medicine, and who shall certify, for the information of the immigration officers and the boards of special inquiry hereinafter provided for, any and all physical and mental defects or diseases observed by said medical officers in any such alien; or, should medical officers of the United States Public Health Service be not available, civil surgeons of not less than four years' professional experience may be employed in such emergency for such service, upon terms as may be prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. Medical officers of the United States Public Health Service who have had especial training in the diagnosis of insanity and mental defect shall be detailed for duty or employed at all large ports of entry, and such medical officers shall be provided with suitable facilities for the detention and examination of all arriving aliens in whom insanity or mental defect is suspected, and the services of interpreters shall be provided for such examination. That the inspection, other than the physical and mental examination, of aliens, including those seeking admission or readmission to or the privilege of passing through or residing in the United States, and the examination of aliens arrested within the United States under this act, shall be conducted by immigrant inspectors, except as hereinafter provided in regard to boards of special inquiry. Immigrant inspectors are hereby authorized and empowered to board and search for aliens any vessel, railway car, conveyance, or vehicle in which they believe aliens are being brought into the United States. Said inspectors shall have power to administer oaths and to take and consider evidence touching the right of any alien to enter, reenter, pass through, or reside in the United States, and, where such action may be necessary, to make a written record of such evidence; and any person to whom such an oath has been administered, under the provisions of this act, who shall knowingly or willfully give false evidence or swear to any false statement in any way affecting or in relation to the right of any alien to admission, or readmission to, or to pass through, or to reside in the United States shall be deemed guilty of perjury and be punished as provided by section 125 of the act approved March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States." Any commissioner of immigration or inspector in charge shall also have power to require the attendance and testimony of witnesses before said inspectors and the production of books, papers, and documents touching the right of any alien to enter, reenter, reside in, or pass through the United States, and to that end may invoke the aid of any court of the United States; and any district court within the jurisdiction of which investigations are being conducted by an immigrant inspector may, in the event of neglect or refusal to respond to a subpœna issued by any commissioner of immigration or inspector in charge or refusal to testify before said immigrant inspector, issue an order requiring such person to appear before said immigrant inspector, produce books, papers, and documents if demanded, and testify; and any failure to obey such order of the court shall be punished by the court as a contempt thereof. That any person, including employees, officials, or agents of transportation companies, who shall assault, resist, prevent, impede, or interfere with any immigration official or employee in the performance of his duty under this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not less than six months nor more than two years, or by a fine of not less than two hundred nor more than two thousand dollars; and any person who shall use any deadly or dangerous weapon in resisting any immigration official or employee in the performance of his duty shall be deemed guilty of a felony and shall on conviction thereof be punished by imprisonment for not less than 1 nor more than 10 years. Every alien who may not appear to the examining immigrant inspector at the port of arrival to be clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to land shall be detained for examination in relation thereto by a board of special inquiry. In the event of rejection by the board of special inquiry, in all cases where an appeal to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is permitted by this act, the alien shall be so informed and shall have the right to be represented by counsel or other adviser on such appeal. The decision of an immigrant inspector, if favorable to the admission of any alien, shall be subject to challenge by any other immigrant inspector, and such challenge shall operate to take the alien whose right to land is so challenged before a board of special inquiry for its investigation.

"SEC. 17. That boards of special inquiry shall be appointed by the commissioner of immigration or inspector in charge at the various ports of arrival as may be necessary for the prompt determination of all cases of immigrants detained at such ports under the provisions of the law. Each board shall consist of three members, who shall be selected from such of the immigrant officials in the service as the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, shall from time to time designate as qualified to serve on such boards. When in the opinion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the maintenance of a permanent board of special inquiry for service at any sea or land border port is not warranted, regularly constituted boards may be detailed from other stations for temporary service at such port, or, if that be impracticable, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall authorize the creation of boards of special inquiry by the immigration officials in charge at such ports, and shall determine what Government officials or other persons shall be eligible for service on such boards. Such boards shall have authority to determine whether an alien who has been duly held shall be allowed to land or shall be deported. All hearings before such boards shall be separate and apart from the public. Such boards shall keep a complete permanent record of their proceedings and of all such testimony as may be produced before them; and the decision of any two members of a board shall prevail, but either the alien or any dissenting member of the said board may appeal through the commissioner of immigration at the port of arrival and the Commissioner General of Immigration to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and the taking of such appeal shall operate to stay any action in regard to the final disposal of any alien whose case is so appealed until the receipt by the commissioner of immigration at the port of arrival of such decision, which shall be rendered solely upon the evidence adduced before the board of special inquiry. In every case where an alien is excluded from admission into the United States, under any law or treaty now existing or hereafter made, the decision of a board of special inquiry if adverse to the admission of such alien shall be final, unless reversed on appeal to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor: Provided, That the decision of a board of special inquiry, based upon the certificate of the examining medical officer, shall be final as to the rejection of aliens affected with tuberculosis in any form or with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, or with any mental or physical disability which would bring such aliens within any of the classes excluded from admission to the United States under section 3 of this act.

"SEC. 18. That all aliens brought to this country in violation of law shall, if practicable, be immediately sent back, in accommodations of the same class in which they arrived, to the country whence they respectively came on the vessels bringing them. The cost of their maintenance while on land, as well as the expense of the return of such aliens, shall be borne by the owner or owners of the vessels on which they respectively came. That it shall be unlawful for any master, purser, person in charge, agent, owner, or consignee of any such vessel to refuse to receive back on board thereof, or on board of any other vessel owned or operated by the same interests, such aliens; or to fail to detain them thereon; or to refuse or fail to return them in the manner aforesaid to the foreign port from which they came; or to pay the cost of their maintenance while on land; or to make any charge for the return of any such alien; or to take any security from him for the payment of such charge; or to take any consideration to be returned in case the alien is landed; or knowingly to bring to the United States at any time within one year from the date of deportation any alien rejected or arrested and deported under any provision of this act, unless prior to reembarkation the Secretary of Commerce and Labor has consented that such alien shall reapply for admission, as required by section 3 hereof; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that such master, purser, person in charge, agent, owner, or consignee has violated any of the foregoing provisions such master, purser, person in charge, agent, owner, or consignee shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located, or in which any vessel of the line may be found, the sum of $300 for each and every violation of any provision of this section; and no vessel shall have clearance from any port of the United States while any such fine is unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit with the collector of customs of a sum sufficient to cover such fine. If the vessel by which any alien ordered deported came has left the United States and it is impracticable for any reason to deport the alien within a reasonable time by another vessel owned by the same interests, the cost of deportation may be paid by the Government and recovered by civil suit from any agent, owner, or consignee of the vessel: Provided further, That the Commissioner General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, may suspend, upon conditions to be prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, the deportation of any alien found to have come in violation of any provision of this act if, in his judgment, the testimony of such alien is necessary on behalf of the United States Government in the prosecution of offenders against any provision of this act; and the cost of maintenance of any person so detained resulting from such suspension of deportation, and a witness fee in the sum of $1 per day for each day such person is so detained, may be paid from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, or such alien may be released under bond, in the penalty of not less than $500, with security approved by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, conditioned that such alien shall be produced when required as a witness and for deportation. No alien certified, as provided in section 16 of this act, to be suffering from tuberculosis in any form, or from a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease other than one of quarantinable nature, shall be permitted to land for medical treatment thereof in any hospital in the United States, unless with the express permission of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor: Provided further, That upon the certificate of a medical officer of the United States Public Health Service to the effect that the health or safety of an insane alien would be unduly imperiled by immediate deportation, such alien may, at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, be held for treatment until such time as such alien may, in the opinion of such medical officer, be safely deported: Provided further, That upon the certificate of a medical officer of the United States Public Health Service to the effect that a rejected alien is helpless from sickness, mental or physical disability, or infancy, if such alien is accompanied by another alien whose protection or guardianship is required by such rejected alien, such accompanying alien may also be excluded, and the master, agent, owner, or consignee of the vessel in which such alien and accompanying alien are brought shall be required to return said alien and accompanying alien in the same manner as vessels are required to return other rejected aliens.

"SEC. 19. That any alien, at any time within three years after entry, who shall enter the United States in violation of law; any alien who within three years after entry becomes a public charge from causes existing prior to the landing; except as hereinafter provided, any alien who is hereafter sentenced to imprisonment for a term of one year or more because of conviction in this country of a crime involving moral turpitude, committed within three years after the entry of the alien to the United States; any alien who shall be found an inmate of or connected with the management of a house of prostitution or practicing prostitution after such alien shall have entered the United States, or who shall receive, share in, or derive benefit from any part of the earnings of any prostitute; any alien who is employed by, in, or in connection with any house of prostitution or music or dance hall or other place of amusement or resort habitually frequented by prostitutes, or where prostitutes gather, or who in any way assists, protects, or promises to protect from arrest any prostitute; any alien who shall import or attempt to import any person for the purpose of prostitution or for any other immoral purpose; any alien who, after being excluded and deported or arrested and deported as a prostitute, or as a procurer, or as having been connected with the business of prostitution or importation for prostitution or other immoral purposes in any of the ways hereinbefore specified shall return to and enter the United States; any alien convicted and imprisoned for a violation of any of the provisions of section 4 hereof; any alien, at any time within three years after entry, who shall enter the United States by water at any time or place other than as designated by immigration officials, or by land at any place other than one designated as a port of entry for aliens by the Commissioner General of Immigration, or at any time not designated by immigration officials, shall, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, be taken into custody and deported: Provided, That the provision of this section respecting the deportation of aliens convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude shall not apply to one who has been pardoned, nor shall such deportation be made or directed if the court sentencing such alien for such crime shall, at the time of imposing judgment or passing sentence, make a recommendation to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor that such alien shall not be deported in pursuance of this act; nor shall any alien convicted as aforesaid be deported until after the termination of his imprisonment: Provided further, That the provisions of this section, with the exceptions hereinbefore noted, shall be applicable to the classes of aliens therein mentioned irrespective of the time of their entry into the United States. In every case where any person is ordered deported from the United States under the provisions of this act or of any law or treaty now existing, the decision of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall be final.

"SEC. 20. That the deportation of aliens provided for in this act shall, at the option of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, be to the country whence they came or to the foreign port at which such aliens embarked for the United States; or, if such embarkation was for foreign contiguous territory, to the foreign port at which they embarked for such territory; or, if such aliens entered foreign contiguous territory from the United States and later entered the United States, or if such aliens are held by the country from which they entered the United States not to be subjects or citizens of such country, and such country refuses to permit their reentry, or imposes any condition upon permitting reentry, then to the country of which such aliens are subjects or citizens, or to the country in which they resided prior to entering the country from which they entered the United States. If effected at any time within five years after the entry of the alien, such deportation, including one-half of the entire cost of removal to the port of deportation, shall be at the expense of the contractor, procurer, or other person by whom the alien was unlawfully induced to enter the United States, or, if that can not be done, then the cost of removal to the port of deportation shall be at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act, and the deportation from such port shall be at the expense of the owner or owners of such vessels or transportation line by which such aliens respectively came, or, if that is not practicable, at the expense of the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. If such deportation is effected later than five years after the entry of the alien, or, if the deportation is made by reason of causes arising subsequent to entry, the cost thereof shall be payable from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act. A failure or refusal on the part of the masters, agents, owners, or consignees of vessels to comply with the order of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to take on board, guard safely, and transport to the destination specified any alien ordered to be deported under the provisions of this act shall be punished by the imposition of the penalties prescribed in section 18 of this act: Provided, That when in the opinion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the mental or physical condition of such alien is such as to require personal care and attendance, he may employ a suitable person for that purpose, who shall accompany such alien to his or her final destination, and the expense incident to such service shall be defrayed in like manner. Pending the final disposal of the case of any alien so taken into custody he may be released under a bond in the penalty of not less than $500 with security approved by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, conditioned that such alien shall be produced when required for a hearing or hearings in regard to the charge upon which he has been taken into custody, and for deportation if he shall be found to be unlawfully within the United States.

"SEC. 21. That any alien liable to be excluded because likely to become a public charge or because of physical disability other than tuberculosis in any form or a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease may, if otherwise admissible, nevertheless be admitted in the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor upon the giving of a suitable and proper bond or undertaking, approved by said Secretary, in such amount and containing such conditions as he may prescribe, to the United States and to all States, Territories, counties, towns, municipalities, and districts thereof, holding the United States and all States, Territories, counties, towns, municipalities, and districts thereof harmless against such alien becoming a public charge. The admission of such alien shall be a consideration for the giving of such bond or undertaking. Suit may be brought thereon in the name and by the proper law officers either of the United States Government or of any State, Territory, District, county, town, or municipality in which such alien becomes a public charge.

"SEC. 22. That wherever an alien shall have taken up his permanent residence in this country, and shall have filed his declaration of intention to become a citizen, and thereafter shall send for his wife or minor children to join him, if said wife or any of said children shall be found to be affected with any contagious disorder, such wife or children shall be held, under such regulations as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall prescribe, until it shall be determined whether the disorder will be easily curable or whether they can be permitted to land without danger to other persons; and they shall not be either admitted or deported until such facts have been ascertained; and if it shall be determined that the disorder is easily curable and the husband or father or other responsible person is willing to bear the expense of the treatment, they may be accorded treatment in hospital until cured and then be admitted, or if it shall be determined that they can be permitted to land without danger to other persons, they may, if otherwise admissible, thereupon be admitted.

"SEC. 23. That the Commissioner General of Immigration shall perform all his duties under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. Under such direction he shall have charge of the administration of all laws relating to the immigration of aliens into the United States, and shall have the control, direction, and supervision of all officers, clerks, and employees appointed thereunder; he shall establish such rules and regulations, prescribe such forms of bond, reports, entries, and other papers, and shall issue from time to time such instructions, not inconsistent with law, as he shall deem best calculated for carrying out the provisions of this act and for protecting the United States and aliens migrating thereto from fraud and loss, and shall have authority to enter into contract for the support and relief of such aliens as may fall into distress or need public aid, and to remove to their native country, at any time within three years after entry, at the expense of the appropriations for the enforcement of this act, such as fall into distress or need public aid from causes arising subsequent to their entry and are desirous of being so removed; he shall prescribe rules for the entry and inspection of aliens along the borders of Canada and Mexico, so as not unnecessarily to delay, impede, or annoy persons in ordinary travel between the United States and said countries, and shall have power to enter into contracts with transportation lines for the said purpose; it shall be the duty of the Commissioner General of Immigration to detail officers of the Immigration Service from time to time as may be necessary, in his judgment, to secure information as to the number of aliens detained in the penal, reformatory, and charitable institutions (public and private) of the several States and Territories, the District of Columbia, and other territory of the United States and to inform the officers of such institutions of the provisions of law in relation to the deportation of aliens who have become public charges. He may, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, whenever in his judgment such action may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of this act, detail immigration officers, and also surgeons of the United States Public Health Service employed under this act for service in foreign countries. The duties of commissioners of immigration and other immigration officials in charge of districts, ports, or stations shall be of an administrative character, to be prescribed in detail by regulations prepared under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor: Provided, That for the purpose of making effective the provisions of this section relating to the protection of aliens from fraud and loss, and also the provisions of section 30 of this act, relating to the distribution of aliens, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall establish and maintain immigrant stations at such interior places as may be necessary, and, in the discretion of the said Secretary, aliens in transit from ports of landing to such interior stations shall be accompanied by immigrant inspectors.

"SEC. 24. That immigrant inspectors and other immigration officers, clerks, and employees shall hereafter be appointed and their compensation fixed and raised or decreased from time to time by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor upon the recommendation of the Commissioner General of Immigration and in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service act of January 16, 1883: Provided, That said Secretary, in the enforcement of that portion of this act which excludes contract laborers, may employ, without reference to the provisions of the said civil-service act, or to the various acts relative to the compilation of the official register, such persons as he may deem advisable and from time to time fix, raise, or decrease their compensation. He may draw annually from the appropriation for the enforcement of this act $50,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended for the salaries and expenses of persons so employed and for expenses incident to such employment; and the accounting officers of the Treasury shall pass to the credit of the proper disbursing officer expenditures from said sum without itemized account whenever the Secretary of Commerce and Labor certifies that an itemized account would not be for the best interests of the Government: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to alter the mode of appointing commissioners of immigration at the several ports of the United States as provided by the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 18, 1894, or the official status of such commissioners heretofore appointed.

"SEC. 25. That the district courts of the United States are hereby invested with full and concurrent jurisdiction of all causes, civil and criminal, arising under any of the provisions of this act. That it shall be the duty of the United States district attorney of the proper district to prosecute every such suit when brought by the United States under this act. Such prosecutions or suits may be instituted at any place in the United States at which the violation may occur or at which the person charged with such violation may be found. That no suit or proceeding for a violation of the provisions of this act shall be settled, compromised, or discontinued without the consent of the court in which it is pending, entered of record, with the reasons therefor.

"SEC. 26. That all exclusive privileges of exchanging money, transporting passengers or baggage, or keeping eating houses, and all other like privileges in connection with any United States immigrant station, shall be disposed of after public competition, subject to such conditions and limitations as the Commissioner General of Immigration, under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, may prescribe, and all receipts accruing from the disposal of such exclusive privileges shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States. No intoxicating liquors shall be sold at any such immigrant station.

"SEC. 27. That for the preservation of the peace and in order that arrests may be made for crimes under the laws of the States and Territories of the United States where the various immigrant stations are located the officers in charge of such stations, as occasion may require, shall admit therein the proper State and municipal officers charged with the enforcement of such laws, and for the purpose of this section the jurisdiction of such officers and of the local courts shall extend over such stations.

"SEC. 28. That any person who knowingly aids or assists any anarchist or any person who believes in or advocates the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or who disbelieves in or is opposed to organized government or all forms of law, or who advocates the assassination of public officials, or who is a member of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or who advocates or teaches the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character, to enter the United States, or who connives or conspires with any person or persons to allow, procure, or permit any such anarchist or person aforesaid to enter therein shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or both.

"SEC. 29. That the President of the United States is authorized, in the name of the Government of the United States, to call, in his discretion, an international conference, to assemble at such point as may be agreed upon, or send special commissioners to any foreign country, for the purpose of regulating by international agreement, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, the immigration of aliens to the United States; of providing for the mental, moral, and physical examination of such aliens by American consuls or other officers of the United States Government at the ports of embarkation, or elsewhere; of securing the assistance of foreign Governments in their own territories to prevent the evasion of the laws of the United States governing immigration to the United States; of entering into such international agreements as may be proper to prevent the immigration of aliens who, under the laws of the United States, are or may be excluded from entering the United States, and of regulating any matters pertaining to such immigration.

"SEC. 30. That there shall be maintained a division of information in the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization; and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall provide such clerical and other assistance as may be necessary. It shall be the duty of said division to promote a beneficial distribution of aliens admitted into the United States among the several States and Territories desiring immigration. Correspondence shall be had with the proper officials of the States and Territories, and said division shall gather from all available sources useful information regarding the resources, products, and physical characteristics of each State and Territory, and shall publish such information in different languages and distribute the publications among all admitted aliens at the immigrant stations of the United States and to such other persons as may desire the same. When any State or Territory appoints and maintains an agent or agents to represent it at any of the immigrant stations of the United States, such agents shall, under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, have access to aliens who have been admitted to the United States for the purpose of presenting, either orally or in writing, the special inducements offered by such State or Territory to aliens to settle therein. While on duty at any immigrant station such agents shall be subject to all the regulations prescribed by the Commissioner General of Immigration, who, with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, may, for violation of any such regulations, deny to the agent guilty of such violation any of the privileges herein granted.

"SEC. 31. That any person, including the owner, agent, consignee, or master of any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place, who shall knowingly sign on the ship's articles, or bring to the United States as one of the crew of such vessel, any alien, with intent to permit such alien to land in the United States in violation of the laws and treaties of the United States regulating the immigration of aliens, or who shall falsely and knowingly represent to the immigration authorities at the port of arrival that any such alien is a bona fide member of the crew, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding $5,000, for which sum the said vessel shall be liable and may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense.

"SEC. 32. That no alien excluded from admission into the United States by any law or treaty of the United States regulating the immigration of aliens, and employed on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place, shall be permitted to land in the United States, except temporarily for medical treatment, or pursuant to regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor providing for the ultimate removal or deportation of such alien from the United States, and the negligent failure of the owner, agent, consignee, or master of such vessel to detain on board any such alien after notice in writing by the immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival, and to deport such alien, if required by such immigration officer or by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, shall render such owner, agent, consignee, or master liable to a penalty not exceeding $1,000, for which sum the said vessel shall be liable, and may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense.

"SEC. 33. That it shall be unlawful and be deemed a violation of the preceding section to pay off or discharge any alien employed on board any vessel arriving in the United States from any foreign port or place, unless duly admitted pursuant to the laws and treaties of the United States regulating the immigration of aliens: Provided, That in case any such alien intends to reship on board any other vessel bound to any foreign port or place he shall be allowed to land for the purpose of so reshipping, and may be paid off, discharged, and permitted to remove his effects, anything in such laws or treaties or in this act to the contrary notwithstanding, provided due notice of such proposed action first be given to the principal immigration officer in charge at the port of arrival.

"SEC. 34. That any alien seaman who shall desert his vessel in a port of the United States or who shall land therein contrary to the provisions of this act shall be deemed to be unlawfully in the United States and shall, at any time within three years thereafter, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, be taken into custody and brought before a board of special inquiry for examination as to his qualifications for admission to the United States, and if not admitted said alien seaman shall be deported at the expense of the appropriation for this act as provided in section 20 of this act.

"SEC. 35. That it shall be unlawful for any vessel carrying passengers between a port of the United States and a port of a foreign country, upon arrival in the United States, to have on board employed thereon any alien afflicted with idiocy, imbecility, insanity, epilepsy, tuberculosis in any form, or a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease, if it appears to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, from an examination made by a medical officer of the United States Public Health Service, and is so certified by such officer, that any such alien was so afflicted at the time he was shipped or engaged and taken on board such vessel and that the existence of such affliction might have been detected by means of a competent medical examination at such time; and for every such alien so afflicted on board any such vessel at the time of arrival the owner, agent, consignee, or master thereof shall pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $25; and no vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine and while it remains unpaid: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine: Provided further, That such fine may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, be mitigated or remitted.

"SEC. 36. That upon arrival of any vessel in the United States from any foreign port or place it shall be the duty of the owner, agent, consignee, or master thereof to deliver to the principal immigration officer in charge of the port of arrival lists containing the names of all aliens employed on such vessel, stating the positions they respectively hold in the ship's company, when and where they were respectively shipped or engaged, and specifying those to be paid off and discharged in the port of arrival; or lists containing so much of such information as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall by regulation prescribe; and after the arrival of any such vessel it shall be the duty of such owner, agent, consignee, or master to report to such immigration officer, in writing, as soon as discovered, all cases in which any such alien has deserted the vessel, giving a description of such alien, together with any information likely to lead to his apprehension; and before the departure of any such vessel it shall be the duty of such owner, agent, consignee, or master to deliver to such immigration officer a further list containing the names of all alien employees who were not employed thereon at the time of the arrival, but who will leave port thereon at the time of her departure, and also the names of those, if any, who have been paid off and discharged, and of those, if any, who have deserted or landed or been duly admitted; and in case of the failure of such owner, agent, consignee, or master so to deliver either of the said lists of such aliens arriving and departing, respectively, or so to report such cases of desertion, or landing, such owner, agent, consignee, or master shall, if required by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, pay to the collector of customs of the customs district in which the port of arrival is located the sum of $10 for each alien concerning whom correct lists are not delivered or a true report is not made as above required; and no such vessel shall be granted clearance pending the determination of the question of the liability to the payment of such fine and, in the event such fine is imposed, while it remains unpaid, nor shall such fine be remitted or refunded: Provided, That clearance may be granted prior to the determination of such question upon deposit of a sum sufficient to cover such fine.

"SEC. 37. The word 'person' as used in this act shall be construed to import both the plural and the singular, as the case may be, and shall include corporations, companies, and associations. When construing and enforcing the provisions of this act, the act, omission, or failure of any director, officer, agent, or employee of any corporation, company, or association acting within the scope of his employment or office shall in every case be deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such corporation, company, or association, as well as that of the person acting for or in behalf of such corporation, company, or association.

"SEC. 38. That this act, except as otherwise provided in section 3, shall take effect and be enforced from and after July 1, 1913. The act of March 26, 1910, amending the act of February 20, 1907, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States; the act of February 20, 1907, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, except section 34 thereof; the act of March 3, 1903, to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, except section 34 thereof; and all other acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed on and after the taking effect of this act: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to repeal, alter, or amend existing laws relating to the immigration or exclusion of Chinese persons or persons of Chinese descent, nor to repeal, alter, or amend section 6, chapter 453, third session Fifty-eighth Congress, approved February 6, 1905, or the act approved August 2, 1882, entitled 'An act to regulate the carriage of passengers by sea,' and amendments thereto: Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to affect any prosecution, suit, action, or proceedings brought, or any act, thing, or matter, civil or criminal, done or existing at the time of the taking effect of this act, except as mentioned in the last proviso of section 19 hereof; but as to all such prosecutions, suits, actions, proceedings, acts, things, or matters, the laws or parts of laws repealed or amended by this act are hereby continued in force and effect."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of North Carolina, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to pass the Webb-Kenyon-Sheppard bill, relative to shipping liquors into prohibition territory.

Whereas the State of North Carolina, by a direct vote of the people, has prohibited the manufacture and sale of liquors; and

Whereas the Federal Government under its present laws protects the liquor traffic outside of the State in shipping and delivering their liquors to illicit dealers within the State of North Carolina, thus interfering with the State in the enforcement of her liquor laws; and

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States a measure known as the Webb-Kenyon-Sheppard bill (S. 4043), which has as its purpose the prevention of interstate shipment of liquors which are to be disposed of in violation of the State laws: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and the same is hereby, earnestly memorialized and requested to pass the said Webb-Kenyon-Sheppard bill at the earliest possible date; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, properly certified, be forwarded at once to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the President of the Senate of the United States.

In the general assembly read three times and ratified this the 29th day of January, 1913.

H. N. PHARR,
President pro tempore of the Senate.
GEO. W. CONNOR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Examined and found correct.

NEWELL, for Committee.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Raleigh, January 30, 1913.

I, J. Bryan Grimes, secretary of state of the State of North Carolina, do hereby certify the foregoing and attached two sheets to be a true copy from the records of this office.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal.

Done in office at Raleigh, this 30th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1913.

Mr. DU PONT presented a petition of the congregation of the First Baptist Church, of New Castle, Del., praying for the passage of the so-called Kenyon-Sheppard interstate liquor bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CATRON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 8139) for the relief of William W. Prude, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1173) thereon.

Mr. BRISTOW, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 17256) to fix the status of officers of the Army and Navy detailed for aviation duty, and to increase the efficiency of the aviation service, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 1174) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 6371) to fix the status of officers of the Army detailed for aviation duty, and to increase the efficiency of the aviation service, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PENROSE, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2359) to refund certain tonnage taxes and light dues, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 8333) granting an increase of pension to Emily H. Bailey (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 8334) granting an increase of pension to Mary J. Mackin (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 8335) to establish the legislative reference bureau of the Library of Congress and the congressional corps of legislative investigators, and to maintain them until July 1, 1914; to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 8336) granting to the civilian employees of the United States the right to receive from it compensation for injuries sustained in the course of their employment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment providing for the survey of the channel from St. Johns River to Crescent City, Fla., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment providing for a harbor of refuge for the safe anchorage of vessels at Key West, Fla., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRYAN submitted an amendment providing for the improvement of the harbor at Miami (Biscayne Bay), Fla., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment providing for indefinite leaves of absence under certain conditions for employees in the postal service who have become incapacitated through superannuation, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CURTIS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,000 to complete the sidewalks, curbing, etc., around the new post-office building at Clay Center, Kans., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 to procure for the Bureau of Standards a large testing machine of fine quality for transverse loads on built-up beams, bridge girders, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HITCHCOCK submitted an amendment proposing to increase the number of post-office inspectors in charge of divisions, at $3,000 each, from 15 to 16, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment providing for a survey of the Apoon mouth of the Yukon River, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

THE SENATE CHAMBER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the 15th day of January the Senate adopted a resolution (S. Res. 432), which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate pro tempore is hereby authorized to appoint a special committee of five Senators. Said committee shall investigate and at the earliest practicable date report to the Senate whether it is feasible and desirable to improve or remodel the Senate Chamber and the rooms thereunto appertaining.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the terms of the resolution the Chair appoints Mr. REED, Mr. OLIVER, Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. LIPPITT, and Mr. OWEN members of the special committee.

REPORT OF NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

Mr. WETMORE. I present the annual report of the National Academy of Sciences for the fiscal year 1912, as required by statute. The same statute provides for the printing, so that no action on the part of the Senate is required. I ask that the report may lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will lie on the table.

THE FEDERAL ADMINISTRATIVE (S. DOC. NO. 1054).

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a copy of an article by Jasper Yeates Brinton, assistant United States attorney, Philadelphia, Pa., on "Some powers and problems of the Federal administrative," which I regard as a very valuable document. I ask that the paper be printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONNECTICUT RIVER DAM.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like to have a little better order in the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be in order. The Senator from Connecticut complains that on account of the confusion he is unable to make himself heard.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wanted order so that Senators might hear me while I make a request for unanimous consent. I did not want any question to arise about Senators understanding the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, there has been upon the calendar for several weeks an important bill concerning the authorization of a dam across the Connecticut River. There is opposition to the measure on the part of some Senators, and the views of the minority have been filed. It is very important that action of some kind shall be taken upon it at this session if possible. I have conferred with the Senator who drew the views of the minority, and he has agreed with me and the chairman of the Committee on Commerce and the Senator under whose immediate charge the bill is that it might be taken up, if the other Senators would agree to it, on next Thursday for consideration and action.

I send to the desk a request for unanimous consent, which I hope may be granted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Thursday, February 6, 1913, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 8033, Calendar No. 1001, authorizing the construction of a dam across the Connecticut River, and before adjournment on that legislative day will vote upon any amendment that may be pending, all amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill through regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

This agreement shall not interfere with the unanimous-consent agreement entered into on January 11, 1913, concerning Senate bill 4043, to prohibit interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors in certain cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this bill apparently is of local importance only; and it would seem strange perhaps that I should make any suggestions about it; but the bill carries a provision which establishes a policy, as I understand, with reference to power sites in this country.

I am not sufficiently familiar with the bill to express my views as to how I would finally act upon the matter, but it is a matter of vital importance to that portion of the country from which I have the good fortune to come. There is no measure which will come before the Senate at this session of so much importance to the people of the West as this particular measure. I only want to say that, if we are going now to take steps to establish a policy with reference to conservation, I want an opportunity to present a side of that subject which has not yet been given very much attention.

We have succeeded splendidly in tying up all the natural resources of the West, and, so far as they have been tied up as against waste and monopoly, the West does not object; but they have been tied up just as successfully and just as effectively against the people of the West. If a conservation policy is now in its inception, I want, if I can, to attach to the measure some provision which will also give some relief to those who, in good faith, are trying to avail themselves of some of the natural resources of the West. I wish, therefore, the Senator from Connecticut would not make this request for unanimous consent prior to Monday. It may be that by that time I could agree to the date suggested by him, but it gives very little time for discussion in the closing hours of the session, and very little time for consideration. I shall endeavor not to interfere with the consideration of the bill or the convenience of the Senator from Connecticut; but, in view of its great importance to us, I should like to have the Senator defer his request until Monday at least, and then I hope to be able to determine definitely whether or not I can get my amendment ready.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, Mr. President, I have to yield to the request of the Senator.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate, No. 35, providing for the assembling of the two Houses of Congress for the counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

The message also announced that the House had appointed Mr. RUCKER of Missouri and Mr. YOUNG of Michigan tellers on the part of the House.

POPULAR GOVERNMENT.

Mr. OWEN. I ask unanimous consent for an order to print 1,000 copies of Senate Document No. 603, Sixty-first Congress, second session, which is exhausted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before that is granted, reserving the right to object, what is the document?

Mr. OWEN. It is a document giving a list of the various statutes relating to the people's rule system of government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I shall object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. SANDERS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 8273) authorizing the Secretary of War to make certain donations of condemned cannon and cannon balls.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 8273) authorizing the Secretary of War to make certain donations of condemned cannon and cannon balls.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of War to deliver condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces and suitable outfit of cannon balls as follows:

To the city of Lancaster, in the State of Pennsylvania, for the use of General William S. McCaskey Camp, No. 53, United Spanish War Veterans;

To the town of Washington, in the State of Mississippi, for the use of Jefferson College;

To the city of Corinth, in the State of Mississippi;

To the city of Grand Forks, in the State of North Dakota;

To the city of Lakota, in the State of North Dakota;

To the State of North Dakota, for use at the Fort Rice Memorial Park;

To the proper authorities of the State Soldiers' Home at Port Orchard, Wash.;

To the city of Davenport, Wash.;

To the city of Trinidad, in the State of Colorado, for the use of the Trinidad Post, No. 25, Grand Army of the Republic; and

To the city of Rocky Ford, in the State of Colorado, for the use of the Wadsworth Post, No. 93, Grand Army of the Republic.

Mr. SANDERS. On behalf of the committee I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 5, after the word "Dakota," it is proposed to strike out "one" and insert "two."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to offer an amendment.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senator from Tennessee has a number of amendments to submit on behalf of the committee. Then other amendments would naturally be in order.

Mr. SANDERS. On behalf of the committee I offer the amendments which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 12, it is proposed to insert:

To the city of Minot, in the State of North Dakota, one condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpiece and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

On page 3, after line 2, to insert:

To the city of Raton, in the county of Colfax and State of New Mexico, two condemned bronze or brass cannon and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

To the town of Lookout Mountain, in the State of Tennessee, two condemned cannon and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Following the amendment just agreed to, it is proposed to insert:

To the county of Mecklenburg, in the State of Virginia, two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment last agreed to it is proposed to insert:

To the city of Jackson, in the State of Mississippi, one condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpiece and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment last agreed to it is proposed to insert:

To the city of Bellevue, in the State of Ohio, one condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpiece and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment last agreed to it is proposed to insert:

To the city of Jacksonville, in the State of Florida, two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment last agreed to it is proposed to insert:

To the Greenbrier Military Academy at Lewisburg, in the State of West Virginia, two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment last agreed to it is proposed to insert:

To the county of Lamoille, in the State of Vermont, two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment last agreed to it is proposed to insert:

To the University of Utah at Salt Lake City, in the State of Utah, two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. I move an amendment to include the University of Colorado at Boulder, Colo.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment last agreed to it is proposed to insert:

To the University of Colorado at Boulder, in the State of Colorado, two condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpieces and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert:

To the city of Virginia, in the State of Minnesota, one condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpiece and a suitable outfit of cannon balls.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LACE-MAKING AND OTHER MACHINERY.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12813) to refund duties collected on lace-making and other machines and parts or accessories thereof imported subsequently to August 5, 1909, and prior to January 1, 1911.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill, which will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM W. PRUDE.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of order of business 1040, being the bill (S. 8139) for the relief of William W. Prude.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the President of the United States to appoint William W. Prude, late a cadet at the Military Academy at West Point, second lieutenant of Infantry of the Army, and to place him upon the retired list with the pay of a retired second lieutenant of Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SETTLERS ON UNSURVEYED LANDS.

Mr. JONES. I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill (S. 8190) authorizing settlers on unsurveyed lands to make final proof under laws existing at the time of settlement.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 1, line 9, after the word "perfect," to strike out "his," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person entitled to enter lands under the homestead laws, who may have established residence upon unsurveyed lands prior to the passage and approval of the act of June 6, 1912, entitled "An act to amend section 2291 and section 2297 of the Revised Statutes relating to homesteads," may perfect his proof for such lands under said act of June 6, 1912, or under the law existing at the time of the establishment of such residence, as he may elect, such election to be signified to the Department of the Interior in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAROLINE O. BALLARD.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution 439, a resolution submitted by me and reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, being Calendar No. 1028.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Caroline O. Ballard, widow of William S. Ballard, late a messenger of the Senate, a sum equal to six months' salary at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock p. m., Saturday, February 1) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 3, 1913, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 1, 1913.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Out of the deeps where the purest and sweetest affections have their birth and from which spring spontaneously faith, reverence, worship, we cry unto Thee, O God, our Father, for help, strength, guidance in the onward march of time, that our lives may be worthy and our acts in consonance with Thy will; that at the end of our earthly sojourn we may merit Thine approval. And everlasting praise be Thine in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FUR-SEAL INVESTIGATION.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make the hearings relating to the investigation of the fur-seal industries of Alaska a part of the report of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to make the hearings in the fur-seal investigation a part of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania how extensive these hearings are?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. They contain about 1,000 pages, but nearly all of it is in type in the Printing Office. The hearings have been carried away and there is such a demand for them that it will become necessary to have some more printing done in the case. I thought it would be better to make it a part of the report. There has been a tangle in the fur-seal business for 40 years, and we have endeavored to settle the dispute, so far as investigations are concerned, up to this time, so that there will be no investigation needed in the future. I thought it would be a good idea to make a public document of the entire proceedings.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this is not a very good plan without first going to the Committe on Printing.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. It has been the custom heretofore to make it a part of the report, I understand, and I really feel it is hardly necessary to do that, I would say to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I will state that I have endeavored to get some matters printed as documents heretofore and have been unable to do so because the Committee on Printing has objected to printing these matters as documents. I believe they ought to go to the Committee on Printing, and let that committee decide the matter of whether we shall have this printed as a document.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not asking to have it printed as a document, but as a part of his report.

Mr. FOSTER. In practice it would amount to the same thing as though it were printed as a document.

Mr. ROTHERMEL. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman from Illinois that the entire committee has agreed that it is necessary to do this.

The SPEAKER. How much is there of it?

Mr. ROTHERMEL. There are about 1,000 pages, but about 75 per cent of that is in type in the Government Printing Office.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman would let the matter go over to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 28499, the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for further consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with Mr. RODDENBERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose yesterday there was an amendment pending presented by the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. BORLAND.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, for the present I will yield to the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 25 of the bill, under an agreement reached yesterday, for the purpose of offering an amendment which obviates the difficulty which we encountered yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 25, after line 7, insert as a new paragraph the following: "The portable asphalt plant purchased under the appropriation for repairs of streets, avenues, and alleys for the fiscal year 1913 may be operated under the immediate direction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia in doing such work of resurfacing and repairs to asphalt pavements, in the repair of macadam streets by constructing on such macadam streets an asphalt-macadam wearing surface, and in the construction of asphaltic macadam surfaces on concrete base as in their judgment may be economically performed by the use of said plant, and so much of this appropriation as is necessary for the purposes aforesaid is hereby made available for such work: Provided, That at no time hereafter shall more work of resurfacing and repairs be done with the portable asphalt plant than can be accomplished with the single portable plant now owned by the District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss the amendment which was submitted on yesterday.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, is this now offered for the first time?

Mr. BORLAND. No; it was offered last night.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to reserve a point of order upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that when the amendment was offered on yesterday just prior to the committee rising, the question of whether a point of order could be raised was presented. The Chair ruled that no point of order having been made until after debate had began it was too late to make the point of order. The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri was offered and read at the Clerk's desk. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] submitted a few remarks and made some inquiries, whereupon the question of whether a point of order could be made or not was raised, and the Chair ruled that it was too late.

Mr. CANNON. I think the Chair was correct.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important amendment. It changes the law of this District in relation to these improvements entirely. It seems to me that it is as important as any legislation we have been considering this session. There are but 22 Members present this morning, and I do not believe that legislation of this great importance ought to be entered upon unless there is a quorum present. I therefore make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently there is no quorum present, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

During the roll call the Speaker directed that his name be called.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he answered "Present."

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RODDENBERY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee finding itself without a quorum he caused the roll to be called, that 189 Members had answered present, and he reported herewith the names of the absentees to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports that that committee finding itself without a quroum he caused the roll to be called, and 189 Members—a quorum—responded to their names, and he furnishes a list of the absentees to the House.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 15 minutes instead of 5 in order to explain this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] asks that he may proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the pending amendment which I have offered to the District bill embodies a reform for which I have been fighting since the time when I was a member of the District Committee in the Sixty-first Congress, as my former colleagues on that committee well know. It proposes that a portion of the cost of street improvements shall be assessed against the abutting property benefited. That is the law in an overwhelming majority of American cities. Street improvements of a certain class are classed as a special benefit to the property adjoining the improvement and are not classed as a part of the general tax burden of the community. That is the law in nearly every American city of which I know. In the District of Columbia, on the contrary, street improvements of a very important class—pavements and resurfacing—have been paid for entirely out of the general fund. That general fund, as you know, is made up one-half by contributions from the Federal Treasury, which means the people of the United States and in general, and one-half from the general revenues of the District of Columbia. Toward that one-half contributed by the general revenues of the District of Columbia every property owner and resident of the District of Columbia contributes. The merchant contributes on the little stock of groceries on his shelves toward the raising of that general revenue fund; the householder pays on his little household goods; the teamster pays on his wagon; everybody contributes toward that general fund. Then that general fund is drawn upon to provide the street improvements and construction of streets in localities and in additions, in which after they have been brought to a high state of improvements streets have been opened up, paved, and so on, put upon the market as high-priced property, sometimes as $2 or $3 a square foot, much higher than the property that contributes toward their improvement. While they are in the course of improvement, before they are platted and actually put upon the market, they are assessed at comparatively low rates, and contribute only as unplatted property toward this general fund which is going toward their improvement and advancement. Now that is the concrete condition of affairs here. This amendment provides that half of the cost of street improvements shall be charged against the abutting property on both sides, which would mean that one-fourth of it would fall upon a particular piece upon one side. We take the average width of the running surface of the street at 32 feet. The amendment provides that where the street is 32 feet or less one half shall be paid by the property owners on both sides and the other half shall be paid out of the general fund. Where the street is wider than 32 feet, one-fourth of the excess over 32 feet is charged against the abutting property owner. The reason of that, of course, is apparent. There are in the District a number of exceptionally wide streets, more than there are in some of the other American municipalities, and it is only fair that the excessive width shall be only partly borne by the adjoining property. These exceptionally wide streets are in the down-town district, where improvements have been made, so as a practical question we can not improve except on the resurfacing, which is not a very expensive matter.

The amendment also provides that the part which must be paved by the street railway company shall be deducted from the cost of the construction of the street. So that in the aggregate the down-town property will not be charged with a great deal of expense. Now, I am free to confess that I believe it would be perfectly fair on a 32-foot street, or any average width of street, to charge the abutting property with the total cost of the construction or reconstruction of the street, because that is true in 62 per cent of the American cities. In addition to that, gentlemen, as most of you know, the abutting property pays in many cities for the repair of the street. But this amendment leaves the repair of the street still at the expense of the general fund. This is a very conservative amendment. It not only leaves the property owner free from the expense of repair, but it only charges him with one-half of the cost of construction and one-fourth of the excess over the average width of the street. I am free to say that I would have drawn the amendment to make him pay all the cost of a 32-foot street, but this amendment has been prepared with a great deal of care by the assistant engineer officer of the District. I believe in having the principle established that the abutting property contribute, and then we can amend in the future if a demand appears. If they ask for better or further legislation, we, of course, are in position to give it to them from time to time. But at present it is the principle that we are contending for, that a portion of this expense must be paid by the abutting property owner. Now it has been said, and it may be raised in the course of this argument, that a little property owner who has bought his home on the installment plan may be affected by this proposition. The contrary is true. The little property owner who has bought his home on the installment plan will be relieved by the operation of this amendment. He is now being taxed to pay for the construction of the new property. He is not being taxed for his own property, because he bought his own property from the builder, who was engaged in the speculation of putting up these houses. But he bought it with the street improvements put in new, and paid a price which covered those improvements, and he is now taxed for the other property which is sold by the same builder on the installment plan.

Mr. FRANCIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FRANCIS. What does your amendment define a special improvement to be? Within what limits is it?

Mr. BORLAND. It is confined to one class of special improvements, the surfacing of streets and the construction of the same. And it extends the same rule to those streets that now applies to sidewalks and alleys. And that is all. Now suppose we take a little property owner who has bought a house on an 18-foot lot, and that may be at least the average width, although, perhaps, it is a little wider than the average width, of these cheap houses. Suppose he is on a 32-foot street. He and the property owner across the street from him pay for 16 feet of that. In other words, each of them pay for 8 feet, and he pays on 18-foot frontage.

The new construction or entire reconstruction of that street would not cost over $2 a yard, and his whole cost in 11 years would be $32 if he paid for the entire construction of the street. But the resurfacing, which might occur once in five or six years, would not cost over more than $16 or $17 in the entire five or six years. There is not a chance of a hardship on the little property owners or nothing in the argument that he is being taxed for the larger property owner, but it is to equalize the conditions between the little property owner and the big property owner that this amendment is introduced. And, more than that, it is to equalize the condition between the little merchant and the little teamster and the person who is paying on personal property for the construction of these streets. You all know that the bankers and rich men do not pay on securities. They do not pay a penny on the magnificent fortunes here toward the maintenance of the District of Columbia, and, of course, they do not pay for street improvement. The person that has tangible property in the District, who pays a personal tax, and who has only a little bit of a grocery store, pays for the construction of these streets.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I invite the gentleman's attention to the further fact relative to the payment of tax upon tangible property, or not paying it upon intangible property, that under an act of Congress personal adornments are exempt from taxation, so that those who wear thousands and thousands of dollars worth of diamonds in the District of Columbia are exempt by act of Congress from paying taxes upon them.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says the bankers and plutocrats do not pay on securities and property, and so forth. The gentleman says that those who have the diamonds and precious jewels do not pay. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not in the power of Congress to enact legislation that will make the so-called plutocrats pay and those with the fortunes in diamonds pay, and if that would not be better than to tax in the aggregate the great majority of the people in the District who own their little homes? Is it not better to recollect——

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I shall join very heartily with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in the tax reform that he suggests. I am glad that the suggestion comes from him, and I am going to second his efforts with all the determination that I have. But we do not necessarily take the place of this legislation by doing so. The gentleman's argument points out the necessity for this very legislation.

This legislation is a part of the reform to secure justice between property owners, big and little. In my city and district, and I undertake to say in other cities represented by gentlemen here, when real estate men are getting ready an addition for the market they sometimes pave the streets, put in the sewers, put in handsome waiting stations at the car lines, and everything to make the property attractive, and then donate those improvements to the city when they offer their addition for sale. They do not wait for the ordinary machinery of law, but in all cases they, not the property owners, have to pay for those improvements.

Now, we come here to the situation in the District of Columbia, where they have never paid for these improvements. They have always been paid for out of the general fund, one-half of which is paid by the people of the United States at large, so that, unlike the situation in my city, the citizen here will not pay for the street improvement of his own property.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, are we operating under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. We are operating under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, did I consume all of my time?

The CHAIRMAN. All but three minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. CANNON. Under the rules of the House, Mr. Chairman, legislation is prohibited on appropriation bills. At times those rules by special order have been nullified for the time being, and unless points of order are made promptly items on appropriation bills subject to points of order or amendments to appropriation bills subject to points of order are not subject to points of order after debate has begun on such amendments. That is the case here.

Now, it is difficult in five minutes to talk adequately about this amendment, and if I do not get through in five minutes I am going to ask for an additional five minutes. Here is legislation, far-reaching, proposed without notice to the House, without any investigation, so far as I know, and certainly without even the introduction of a bill referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, to tax according to the size of the lot, the linear foot, one-half of the improvement and the resurfacing where the surface of the street is to be renewed, and in the name of benefiting the poor man, the small property holder.

Mr. Chairman, I never owned a foot of property in the District of Columbia, and never expect to. The temptation was strong during this great development of Washington and my service in the House, but I refused to purchase for the simple reason that, as one of the common council for the District, I preferred not to be embarrassed. It was not unlawful to purchase, and I will not say it was contrary to good taste, but I preferred not to be embarrassed in the premises.

Now, what is this propostion? It is to tax, without regard to the value, the property upon the various streets for construction and for resurfacing. Let us see how it would operate. Take Pennsylvania Avenue as an example. I find that there is 91 feet of it. You take out the street car tracks that the street car companies would have to care for, and after you would take out the curbs there would be subject to this taxation 30 feet of it on the adjacent property on each side, that would pay half; and 13½ feet for resurfacing, one-fourth.

Go to F Street; go to G Street. Why, property is constantly decreasing in value on this great, wide Pennsylvania Avenue, while it is constantly increasing in value on F Street and G Street. Property is now worth $30 or $40 a square foot there, and you can not, I dare say, as far as Sixth Street—maybe Seventh Street on the Avenue—you can not get $3 or $4 a square foot. And yet on this broad avenue the many little property holders must care for that broad thoroughfare in this resurfacing.

Take the whole of Washington from the Capitol to the Eastern Branch. There are many streets, wide streets, that are not worth one-tenth part of what property on Massachusetts Avenue from Dupont Circle away out to Rock Creek is worth. Yet there is the same charge. Now we have plenary power.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I might say also that that valuable part of Massachusetts Avenue from Dupont Circle west is improved and will not be taxed for many years to come.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. "He that hath, to him shall be given; and he that hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he hath." That was meant from the spiritual standpoint. Here is a proposition, as I see it, that comes from the physical and material standpoint.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois be given time to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois be given time to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I shall not take much time. I do not wish to weary the Committee of the Whole. Now, in the aggregate, the small property holders in Washington, as I believe, are to be found where the property is the least valuable; and this proposition is that if somebody has 30, 40, or 50 feet in depth and 20 or 30 feet in width, with a shanty on it that is not worth $100 or $1,000, he shall pay just the same as the owner of an apartment house or a six-story hotel like the National Hotel or the Metropolitan Hotel, on the Avenue, and so on. The little fellow, colored or white, who may have only 50 feet in depth, with a one-story shack upon it, pays just as much under this law as the man pays who has a six-story building. He pays just as much as the property owner on F Street or just as much as the owners of the Willard Hotel or property in that neighborhood, where it is said that the ground sells for from $30 to $40 a square foot. And this is proposed in the name of benefiting the poor man.

Gentlemen, take the great houses in this city that cost $100,000, $200,000, $300,000, or half a million dollars, if you choose. It is an open secret that property of that kind does not, according to what it cost, pay one-half of the proportionate tax that the little property of the poor clerk or poor laborer pays. As assessments go in this District the poorer property owners pay two or three times as much tax in proportion to the value of their property. It is said that this policy is pursued in order to enable good improvements to be constructed in this city. Yet under this law the cheap property, that is not worth one-tenth as much as the expensive property, pays just as much for the construction and resurfacing of pavements as does that very valuable property. Oh, they say that they cut off hills and fill valleys, and that great avenues are laid out, and that great capitalists and real estate speculators build houses and sell lots. Yes; they do.

Now, we have plenary power. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] says he wants to relieve the poor man and the multitude of them in Washington, with their little homes, paying taxes already overburdened in comparison, from paying for the improvement of these great avenues. We have plenary power, and I would be ready to join hands with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] under well-matured, well-considered legislation providing that in the improvement of that kind of property the owner of the more valuable property should pay a part or all of the expense, if you choose, of paving or resurfacing the streets.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The House had that plenary power during all the eight years that the gentleman from Illinois was Speaker of the House and appointed the Committee on the District of Columbia. That furnished a fair opportunity to put the gentleman's views into operation.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is correct. I was Speaker for eight years. Before that I was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The gentleman from Missouri says that the bankers do not pay, and that the street car companies and others did not pay proper taxes. But Mr. Babcock, who was chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, being sick, the Committee on Appropriations, of which I was chairman, took up of necessity the question of amending the tax law of the District of Columbia, and that committee spent weeks upon a tax law, and there came a special order making that bill in order as an amendment to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which had been matured by the committee after full notice to all the District, full hearings, and ample discussion. For the time being the Committee on Appropriations became, as to that legislation, practically a Committee on the District of Columbia.

We made it in order, and, as I recollect, 3 to 4 per cent was levied upon the gross earnings of the banks, and a similar amount upon the gross receipts of the street railways. So that while it is true the District Committee did not report it, yet is that any reason why, with a hop, skip, and a jump, the gentleman from Missouri should turn a double somersault, able as he is and having given the investigation that he has, in the twinkling of an eye, and put upon us this legislation that I assert here now will relieve the bankers and the alleged plutocrats and the capitalists and the real estate men and put a further burden upon the small property holder, the poor negro, the poor clerk, and men who live within Washington proper.

Now, if we entered on this matter at all I doubt if there is a man in the House, except my friend from Missouri and possibly the chairman of the District Committee, who is prepared, with a hop, skip, and a jump, in the closing days of the session of Congress, to prepare a proper amendment. The gentleman says, "Why, you can offer an amendment to tax these people as they extend new avenues and go into real estate speculation." Oh, yes; it is easy to say that, but my observation is that it is not an easy task to mature a tax system and do it intelligently under the five-minute rule right off the bat. It requires study and investigation.

Now, the gentleman says that in Kansas City the whole of this charge is placed upon the adjacent property holders without regard to its improvements, without regard to its value. I apprehend that is true. The whole of the charge in certain streets in Danville was placed there, but it works a great hardship. Nevertheless the ordinance was passed and the tax was paid, but property that was worth $200 a front foot paid no more for the improvement of these streets than the property a mile away that was not worth $10 a front foot. It worked an injustice, and yet the desire to have good streets made us pass the ordinance, and the tax was collected.

Now, I want to say, touching the District of Columbia, that it is not on all fours with Kansas City. Kansas City has had a wonderful growth, but it has not had time to apportion the taxes there equitably. It is a wonderful business city and has had wonderful prosperity. Washington, in the aggregate, is made up in its population of clerks, messengers, watchmen, and the great aggregate of them are poor men. It is not a manufacturing city; it is not a business city, except as retailers furnish to the 300,000 people that which they desire to buy. Of course, we come in here and see the beautiful city, one-half of the expense of which is borne by the Government and one-half by the District, and we think they are a favored people. But, gentlemen, they are not the favored people. There are bright people in the public service in Washington; they are splendid and magnificent in intellect. They come here and drop into a groove; but whenever I see one come here and drop into that groove—and I am now speaking of the average man—I feel like saying, "Abandon hope all ye who enter here," because they fall out of acquaintanceship in Illinois, in Missouri, and Oklahoma, and they live and die spending their month's salary, in many cases two or three months in advance, and, speaking respectfully, they get the dry rot. [Applause.] When they drop out of the service they have no way to live. That is a penalty instead of a benefit.

Now, I would have been glad if the gentleman from Missouri, in precipitating this amendment upon the House, had thought about it and had provided for all or a part of the improvement of streets and avenues that extend far out to the northwest, and after a while may extend to the northeast. I would have been glad if he had separated the improvements of that kind and said how much or all that should be made at the expense of the proposed new property that sells from two to three or four dollars a square foot, whereas you can not get one quarter of that here; and when you get down into the territory of the southwest and the southeast property is hardly worth owning.

It is not equitable; it is not fair. Our Democratic friends are soon to come into full power with full responsibility. You are going to have a session of Congress commencing somewhere in March or April. It may be a long session. You have two years in front of you with full power, and I apprehend that my friend from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], still being in the House, will retain his place on the Committee of Appropriations and will be on the—perhaps upon the subcommittee on the District of Columbia. I know that he is able; I know that he is zealous. I am not criticizing him personally; I am commending him; but I do say that, in my opinion, upon this bill in the closing days of this session of Congress, we have neither the time nor the information to properly and equitably enact this legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of this most important subject I believe no better way of discussing it can be had than to go just a little bit into the history of affairs. At one time we had simply the city of Washington, bounded on the south by the Potomac River, upon the east by the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River, upon the north and the northwest by Florida Avenue, and upon the west by a short strip of Rock Creek Park. When the Federal Government concluded to adopt what is known as the half-and-half plan for the city of Washington its contemplation was that it would adopt the half-and-half plan for the about 6,000 acres which composed the original city of Washington.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not mean 6,000 acres in the original city of Washington. It was built in a wilderness.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Still that was the original boundary and embraced about 6,000 acres. In those 6,000 acres were the Anacostia Flats, the Mall, and the Potomac Flats.

When you take those swamps that existed then from the 6,000 acres you have a comparatively small portion left. Congress did agree to appropriate half for the current expenses of that, but by an act of Congress that boundary has been obliterated. You have now no city of Washington, you have no city of Georgetown, but you have instead the District of Columbia, and the half-and-half plan now extends to the 69¾ square miles of the whole District of Columbia.

Tracts of land in the District of Columbia, in the midst of primeval forests, are opened up and laid out into town lots. Under that plan the District of Columbia calls upon the Federal Government to pay one-half for the expense of the streets that are opened and macadamized and paved through that, and the Federal Government does it.

The Federal Government pays its half. Across the eastern branch of the river you find streets laid out and you find authority for Congress to go in there and pave them with asphalt, where there is almost not a house, and if you will look to-day you will find the boxes of the rural route established there. Is that what Congress contemplated when it agreed to go upon the half-and-half plan for the city of Washington? I say that no such contemplation was entertained.

To go further along with the history of the District of Columbia, the act of June 11, 1878, which is the half-and-half plan, taxation was made "uniform." Taxation now in the District of Columbia is not uniform. When did it lose its uniformity? It lost its uniformity under the act of 1902, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. At that time the Committee on Appropriations brought in an appropriation bill for the District of Columbia, and brought in with it a rider of four or five printed pages changing the plan of taxation in the District of Columbia. By that bill the original rate of taxation of $1.50 a hundred upon real estate was changed to $1.50 a hundred upon a two-thirds valuation, instead of $1.50 upon a real valuation as had been theretofore.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. In language the gentleman is correct. In fact he is wrong. In other words, under the operation of that act of 1902 there became a real valuation, more nearly real than ever before that time, by far. Property theretofore was taxed happy-go-lucky and without a full consideration, and Congress concluded that if we could get a real valuation and then make it two-thirds, we would get far greater revenue than we were getting under the assessments and the mode of taxation in vogue up to that time, and such proved to be the fact. The revenues have constantly increased from that time to the present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, before this rider was attached to the appropriation bill in 1902 the rate of taxation in the District of Columbia was "uniform."

Mr. CANNON. It was still uniform.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The adoption of that rider on the appropriation bill brought about the change that I was mentioning. The act of June 11, 1878, the organic act, provided that real estate should be taxed at $1.50 a hundred upon its real value. The rider to which I have just referred changed that law and made the tax rate $1.50 upon two-thirds of its real value. That makes the tax upon real estate a dollar a hundred, and that same rider, gentlemen, did another thing: It left the tax standing at a dollar and a half as to the real value upon the tangible personal property, so the tax law was made to discriminate in favor of real property as against personal property. Real estate is now taxed at a dollar a hundred, and personal property in the District of Columbia is taxed at $1.50 a hundred.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has just criticized this procedure of coming in, as he says, in the last few days of a session to correct the manner of building streets in the District of Columbia. Let me invite the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that when he, as chairman of that committee in 1902, placed this rider, to which I have referred, upon the District appropriation bill, that it did not pass this body until the 3d day of March, just an hour before the adjournment of Congress. With more than 30 days——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I trust the gentleman may have such extension as he may desire.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be permitted to conclude his remarks, as he is chairman of the District of Columbia Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Tennessee ask that the gentleman from Kentucky may be permitted to proceed and conclude his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Now, Mr. Chairman, with some 30 days yet remaining of this session I contend there is ample time to give due consideration to this amendment, and I believe the gentleman from Illinois should be the last of all those here to criticize, in view of the fact that he succeeded in having passed a discriminatory act as to taxation one hour before the final adjournment of Congress in 1902.

The gentleman has said that he has never owned a foot of ground in the District of Columbia. For that I most genuinely and sincerely congratulate him. I have no doubt that his opportunities to have grown rich from real estate transactions here have been many, and I congratulate him most heartily that he has declined them. Mr. Chairman, we have over the signatures of great men who have been in this body and in the other end of the Capitol the statement that they have grown rich out of real estate speculations in the District of Columbia. We know it to be a fact that a recent Vice President of the United States carried real estate in the District of Columbia in the name of his secretary. That statement became a public statement when Mr. Saunders, one of the most reputable and prominent real estate dealers in the District of Columbia, appeared before the Committee on the District of Columbia not a great while ago and made that statement. Now, Mr. Chairman, the question comes down to this: Will the Federal Congress continue to pay half of all the expenses for building the streets in the wilderness portion of the District of Columbia when it was not contemplated in the act of 1871 when the boundary line of the city of Washington and the boundary line of the city of Georgetown were wiped away and these 69¾ square miles were made one municipal corporation instead? The wording of the amendment which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] offers is that when streets lying in front of property owned by the Federal Government are improved the Federal Government must come in and pay its proportion of building the streets just like a private citizen would. What can be fairer, what can be fairer? But to say that a man can own 10 or 100 acres out here in the unbroken wilderness of the District of Columbia and lay it out in lots, streets, and alleys, and come in here and ask the Congress to appropriate a quarter of a million dollars perhaps, and it has been done many times, to build asphalt streets and granitoid pavements through it, and then sell those lots to the poor, not for what they were worth before the Federal money was spent upon them, but for what they were worth before plus the hundreds of thousands of dollars added to them as a subsidy by the Congress.

Talk about the poor! There are three classes of people in this District—one is the rich, the other is the middle class, and the other is the poor. The rich we know, and everybody else knows, are escaping taxation. This is the haven of the tax dodger. Here the rich man can live and die cheaper than anywhere else on earth. We have here no inheritance tax. I have been endeavoring to get out of the District of Columbia Committee an inheritance-tax bill introduced, I believe, by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NYE]. Thus far I have been unable to do so, and it is a sad commentary that even if we did get it out there is a death trap at the other end of this building for such measures.

But, Mr. Chairman, reverting for just one minute to the question of Representatives and Senators owning real estate in the District of Columbia. In the Washington Post of August 28, 1911, is the following most significant statement. It reads as follows:

> The drift of the well-to-do and influential element toward this city could take no better turn than we see in the increasing number of congressional homes. Once they become interested it is noticeable that Members undergo a change of heart that bodes no ill for the municipality. Naturally they come to see that Washington really needs all that Washington people are asking for. Already we owe much to the efforts of Senators and Representatives who have made permanent investments here, and conceivably the good offices of many others would be quickened if proper influences were brought to accelerate the movement from the "deestrict" to the District.

Mr. SIMS. Does it specify what those "proper" elements are that are going to bring about the action of which the gentleman has just read?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I can only say this, that but recently one of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia told me that one of the richest and most powerful men in the District of Columbia had told him that he had made it his policy to have influential Members of the House and Senate purchase real estate in the District of Columbia, in order that their assistance might be had toward keeping down the taxes and toward securing improvements in the District.

Mr. SIMS. All of which that commissioner, I suppose, heartily approved?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is it true or is it not true that the proportion of Representatives who own property in the District of Columbia is quite small on account of the brevity of their tenure?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I believe it is comparatively small, and I am perfectly frank to say that I believe the article which I have just read from the Washington Post is a libel upon Members of Congress. [Applause.] I know that there are men in this body, and I know that there are men in the other body who own their own homes here, that are just as far from being corrupt as the Almighty Himself, and this article is but another of the many libels heaped upon Members of this House who will not blindly go and do their bidding. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That is making them a little too honest. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No, sir. I believe the people have selected to come here and represent them some of the most honest men in the United States.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I agree with that, but I want to suggest that when the gentleman states that men are as honest as the Almighty, that is putting it strong.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I believe there are men here who are absolutely and perfectly honest. For perfect honesty there can be no exaggerated comparison.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman started to segregate the people of this District into three classes, and he mentioned, first, the rich, and then he spoke of the middle classes of this city. Who constitute the middle classes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. As I was saying, the rich are the rich. That is definition sufficient. They are the people who own magnificent homes. They are the people who have big bank accounts. They are the people who have bonds and securities securely locked up, upon which they pay no tax, and they are the people who steer this ship of state from behind. Then, again, we have the humble house owners, and those are the middle class. And then we have those who are too poor to own a home. And by the act of 1902, to which I have just referred, a man who owns a house and leases it pays a dollar a hundred tax upon the house and ground upon which it stands, while the man who is too poor to own a house must pay a dollar and a half a hundred tax upon his little personal effects.

Now, one other feature in this matter presents itself to me. It is no new idea with me, and last fall I prepared a table upon the subject. The table which I now have in my hand has each of the 48 States upon it, and it shows, according to population, what proportion each State bears toward this subsidy granted by Congress to the District of Columbia.

Why, gentlemen, we come here and fight among ourselves, not only day after day, but week after week, as to whether or not the Federal Government shall build one battleship or two. Yet we can scarcely secure a corporal's guard, a dozen men, to come here and participate in the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, by which every Congress grants as a subsidy to the District of Columbia more than the cost of a Dreadnought and pay no sort of attention to it. We fight among ourselves here as to whether the widow of a distinguished general in the War of 1861–1865 shall be paid a pension of $50 a month, and yet we come here and pay as a pension to the widow of a policeman the salary of $50 a month and never ask a question. Part of that pension comes from the revenues of the District of Columbia and the rest of it comes by reaching into the Treasury of the Federal Government for it.

What does each State pay toward this subsidy of which I am speaking? Alabama pays $144,571; Arizona pays $13,770; Arkansas pays $106,081; California pays $160,260; Colorado pays $53,841; Connecticut pays $75,116; Delaware pays $13,633; Florida pays $50,714; Georgia pays $175,810; Idaho pays $21,939; Illinois, $379,945; Indiana, $181,993; Iowa, $149,912; Kansas, $113,941; Kentucky, $154,301; Louisiana, $11,612; Maryland, $50,023; Massachusetts, $87,284; Michigan, $226,849; Minnesota, $189,356; Mississippi, $121,089; Missouri, $221,915; Montana, $25,340; Nebraska, $80,335; Nevada, $5,517; New Hampshire $29,013; New Jersey, $170,962; New Mexico, $22,055; New York, $614,103; North Dakota, $38,884; Ohio, $321,223; Oklahoma, $11,664; Oregon, $45,333; Pennsylvania, $516,498; Rhode Island, $35,562; South Carolina, $102,107; South Dakota, $39,344; Tennessee, $147,218; Texas, $262,561; Utah, $25,158; Vermont, $23,985; Virginia, $138,918; Washington, $76,951; West Virginia $82,282; Wisconsin, $157,262; Wyoming, $9,836; and the District of Columbia, $22,308.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a single question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska. Upon what basis is that table ascertained?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. As I said before reading it, on the basis of population.

Mr. TOWNER. What census?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The last census.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I want to get this correctly in my mind. Does the gentleman's table show that the States of Pennsylvania and New York pay annually over a million dollars taxes to the District of Columbia?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. New York pays $614,103 and Pennsylvania $516,498.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman mind telling us how he arrives at the figures in this particular table? The proportions, as I understand, are based on the population of the States, and, as the gentleman states it, each State contributes so much to the maintenance of the District of Columbia. I want to ascertain the manner in which the statement was prepared.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. For the fiscal year—for the current year——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Based on general appropriations?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes. For the current year the Federal Government has subsidized the District of Columbia to the extent of $6,197,403.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the gentleman divides that amongst the States as per population?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I see.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have here, if the committee will bear with me just a little bit, some more very intersting figures. For streets, sewers, and water mains the State of Alabama pays $14,097.

The State of Arizona pays $1,347; the State of Arkansas, $1,380; California, $15,675; Colorado, $5,267; Connecticut, $7,350; Delaware, $1,335; and so on through with all the States; showing that the subsidy for streets paid by the States of this Union to the District of Columbia amounts to $606,472 this fiscal year.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The gentleman used the term that annually the United States "subsidizes" the District to the extent of something over $6,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; for the current year, $6,197,403.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. How many cents?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Does the gentleman think the word "subsidizing" is the proper term?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I use the term advisedly.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is the amount of money that Congress annually appropriates.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is the amount of money that Congress appropriated for the current fiscal year. For the approaching fiscal year they are asking considerably more.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is the appropriation for the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And that is what the gentleman refers to as a subsidy; that is one-half of the moneys that are expended in the District of Columbia for its government.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes. The total amount contributed for the present fiscal year is more than six millions.

Mr. HELGESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. HELGESEN. Can the gentleman tell this House how much each State would contribute to the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia if the National Government paid its share of the taxes on the property it owns here at a full valuation, under the ordinary system of taxation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is the old, old rule that the king pays no taxes. For the Federal Government to tax itself, collect the money, and return it into the Treasury would be the equivalent of taking money out of one pocket and putting it into the other.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. That is what it is doing now to the extent of $6,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HELGESEN] has put a hypothetical question for the answer to which there is absolutely no basis to work from. If it were a real question instead of a hypothetical one, then we would have a basis from which to fix it. The statement has been made so many times that some people have come to believe that the Federal Government owns one-half of all the property in the District of Columbia.

In 1873 or 1874 Gov. Shepherd made the statement, which found its way into print, that the Federal Government owned one-half of all the property, not in the District of Columbia but in the city of Washington, the city of Washington being then bounded, as I have said, by what is now Florida Avenue. But that statement made by Gov. Shepherd was based upon values and not upon area.

We all know that the Federal buildings here have cost a great deal more than any other buildings in the District. As to what their value is I am not advised. But when we come to area, only one-sixth of the entire District of Columbia is built up, and then, if we consider Federal property in the District of Columbia that is used for Federal purposes alone, we have another subject.

The Federal Government owns Potomac Park, but Potomac Park is not owned by the Federal Government for the exclusive use of the Federal Government. Potomac Park is owned by the Federal Government, improved and kept up for the pleasure of the citizens of Washington. The Federal Government owns Lafayette Square, opposite the White House, but that square is not for the exclusive use of the Federal Government. It is for the use, the pleasure, and the health of the citizens of the city of Washington. The Federal Government owns Lincoln Park. That is not owned for Federal use. It is owned and kept for the pleasure and recreation of the citizens of Washington. Does anybody tell me that that should be a basis for taxation between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia?

I say no; and I further say that when we come to ascertain how much property the Federal Government owns in the District of Columbia for Federal use exclusively, that it is my opinion that all told it is less than 20 acres out of more than 50,000 acres.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that Potomac Park and Rock Creek Park, while owned by the Federal Government, are practically inaccessible to the clerks, the Federal employees of whom the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] spoke awhile ago, and to the average citizen of the District of Columbia? I ask the gentleman if they are not almost altogether used by well-to-do people who go there in their carriages and automobiles?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Almost exclusively used by the rich. Show me one man or woman or child afoot in Rock Creek Park, and I will show you 5,000 in automobiles and carriages.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Did the gentleman from Kentucky ever walk out through there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No, sir; I will never walk out there; it is too far.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have walked out there, and I have seen thousands on foot where I have seen one in an automobile. I have walked out there holidays and every Sunday.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is not a Member on the floor of this House who will agree that he has seen the same thing.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes; I have.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. FARR. I think the gentleman from Kansas is right.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I can testify to the correctness of the statement made by the gentleman from Kansas. I have seen thousands on foot in Rock Creek Park where I have seen a hundred in automobiles.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that I am blind.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman is not blinded by the interests.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. As suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi, the interests have not blinded me, either.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman from Kentucky has given the subject of District affairs a great deal of consideration, and will he tell us how the taxes in the District of Columbia compare with the taxes on property of a similar character in other cities of the population of the city of Washington?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am glad the gentleman asked me that question. I have no table here to read the exact figures from, but I do not hesitate to make the broad statement that taxes in this municipality are less than that of any other city of the same size in the United States. The newspapers are undertaking to blind the people upon that subject. Take the metropolis of my own State, the city of Louisville. There they have a city tax, there they have a county tax, and there they have a State tax. Here you have only the city tax, without the county tax or the State tax. I say that every other city of any consequence in the whole United States, when these three taxes are added together, pays a much larger tax than does the city of Washington.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to call the gentleman's attention to a further analysis of the gentleman's position by stating the fact that most all cities have a State tax, a county tax, a city tax, a school-district tax, and a special improvement tax, all five included in this one tax here.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is true, and we have but one tax here. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] said a few moments ago, the tax upon the big property is less than it should be and the tax on the little home is more than it should be. In confirmation of that I refer gentlemen to the report recently filed in this body by the Committee on the District of Columbia showing that there are 40,000 homes here that are overtaxed, and during the inquiry and during the publicity that was given to that inquiry only one man had the courage to say that he was undertaxed, and that was Gifford Pinchot, and I wish to commend him most highly for it.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. The gentleman has given the subject of taxation much thought and consideration. I will ask the gentleman if he has any information as to how the tangible property and the intangible property has escaped readjustment of taxation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That depends upon how you readjust.

Mr. MICHAEL E. DRISCOLL. I mean how is it brought about?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. You see in the daily press, you see it every day, that there is a "compact" between the District of Columbia and the Federal Government relative to taxation. Between whom was the compact? Who represented the District of Columbia when that compact was made? Less than a dozen men, who beat at the doors of Congress until they succeeded in having the rate of taxation made lower for the rich man without lessening that for the poor man.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Kentucky enumerated a few moments ago the property owned by the Federal Government. I wish he would clear my mind on this impression that I have had for many years—that the roads and streets belong to the Government, that the ground upon which the sidewalks are erected belong to the Government, and that the land between the sidewalk and the buildings, which are constructed on the building line, also belongs to the Government. I would like to ask the gentleman if I am correct in that impression?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will indulge me one moment, I think I can read to him a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on that subject.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to know if the Federal Government owns the roads, the land upon which the sidewalks are constructed, and the intervening land between the sidewalk and the building line.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I can not turn to that decision at this moment, but I will say that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the Federal Government has sovereignty only in the streets. Gov. Shepherd and others who have undertaken to show that the Federal Government owns one-half of the original city of Washington included all the streets, squares, parks, and alleys in that estimate, and in valuing it away back yonder in 1874 placed a valuation of 36 cents a square foot upon all streets in order to prove that idea. All these business houses down town run their cellars or basements out to the curbstone, and that is on property not owned by them and for which they pay no rent. Take the banks and trust companies. Their vaults extend under the streets beyond their own property line, and the property does not belong to them, and yet they rent the vaults that are embraced therein.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman understands that in other cities, where householders do occupy ground not belonging to them under a pavement, they pay rent for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. This Government pays for such rental outside of the customhouse in New York.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Investigations of a subcommittee of the District of Columbia recently have developed that the vaults of the banks and trust companies here, for which they are receiving large revenue, are out under the streets, for which they pay neither to the District of Columbia nor to the Federal Government a single penny.

Mr. Chairman, getting back one moment to the parks, what a ludicrous idea it is to hear stated on this floor and to see paraded through the public press the great overwhelming necessity for opening a park between the old Soldiers' Home and Rock Creek Park! It is only a mile or two, and I imagine I can see the one-legged ex-Federal soldier going down for a few miles through the parks that are provided for his special enjoyment. That idea is absurd. If you are to spend millions of dollars there, that the old soldier may have the benefit of the parks, how long is that going to last for these one-armed and one-legged, full-crutched old men, none of whom can now expect to live more years than you have fingers on your hands. They talk about levying assessments for parks to be acquired under the bill now before us. You may authorize it to be done, but who is to do it? Congress may most solemnly direct that it shall be done, but will it at last be done? More than 20 years ago Congress appropriated $1,200,000 for the acquirement of Rock Creek Park. A commission was appointed to acquire Rock Creek Park. Perhaps the richest man in the District of Columbia a few days ago said before the District of Columbia Committee, when under oath, that he had gone to the President and had secured the appointment of that commission. That commission, when it came to acquire Rock Creek Park, looked up the assessed values of the various tracts of lands that it was to acquire. Then they doubled the amount of the assessed value, with a view of paying the property holders double the amount of the assessed value of their property; but when they had doubled it they found they had money left of the $1,200,000. Having money left they multiplied the assessed valuation by three, and still they had money left. Then they multiplied that assessed valuation by four, and still had money left. Then they multiplied it over and over again, until they paid the owners of that property 600 per cent more than it was assessed at. Those commissioners were charged by solemn act of Congress to assess benefits upon the surrounding property. All but one of that commission has passed to the great beyond, but that assessment of benefits upon the surrounding property to this day stands unmade.

Great sums of money have been spent to beautify that park and improve the value of the surrounding property. Congress has solemnly directed that benefits be assessed upon the surrounding property, but it has not been done in all these 20 years. That commission, or, rather, most of that commission, has died, only one lives, but the commission is not dead. That survives. When the commission last adjourned the record shows that it did not adjourn sine die. Consequently it is within the power of the President of the United States to appoint a commission to take the place of these dead men, that they may go back and assess these benefits.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do.

Mr. SISSON. In speaking of the amount of property which has been condemned for the Government and amounts paid by the Government for this property, the gentleman stated it was six times the assessed value.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Six hundred per cent.

Mr. SISSON. Six hundred per cent more than the assessed value. Is that an exception to the general rule when the Government buys property in the District?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, in answer to that I will say that I do not wish to make a statement unless I can be accurate in it.

Mr. SISSON. I will simply state this to the gentleman: That in the condemnation of the property between the Capitol and the Union Station he will find that the property was assessed at $1 a square foot, and that it was condemned at $6 a square foot, so I simply want to know if six times the assessed value was the general rule when the Government wants to buy property.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I hear it stated, Mr. Chairman, and nobody has disputed or disclaimed it, that the property that is now being condemned between the Capitol and the Union Station is being paid for many times more than it is worth and many times more than it has ever been assessed at until it was known that this property was to be acquired by the Government. I was talking about benefits not having been assessed on property adjacent to Rock Creek Park. There is a proposition pending now to sell that property to the United States. Sell it for what? With these benefits that should have been assessed against it? No; but they propose to sell it to the United States Government, improved as it is by the expenditure of a public fund, with the increased value added. We hear much about the McMillan Park scheme. Ten years ago that was conceived by the real-estate speculators of the District of Columbia. It calls for a chain of parks extending around the town. Over here we have a jail that cost nearly $1,000,000, that is said to be one of the best jails in the whole United States. That falls within the scope of the McMillan Park plan. In order to get away from that your penal institution has gone down to Occoquan, in the State of Virginia, and no man who has information upon the subject will deny the assertion that I now make that it is contemplated to tear down this million-dollar jail and let that ground go into the park system. Already they have planned for it, for a race track and other propositions like that. Mr. Chairman, one other thing. I was informed, Mr. Chairman, in advance of the final draft of this bill that the Committee on Appropriations, or rather the Subcommittee on Appropriations, desired to bring in the amendment which is now pending, introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], but they were apprehensive that the point of order would be raised against it.

I congratulate them for their good intentions in this matter, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] ought specially to be the subject of congratulation of the people of this land throughout its length and breadth for having brought this amendment in here and having managed it so well that it will come to a vote before this House. The question upon this amendment is this: Under the act of June 11, 1878, when it was contemplated that the Federal Government should pay one-half of the current expenses of the city of Washington Congress did agree to pay one-half of all the cost of the streets. But now that it is claimed, now that it is being put into effect, that Congress must pave one-half of all the streets in this 69¼ square miles comprising the District, that is another proposition. So this bill reduces that expenditure from one-half upon the part of the Federal Government to one-third, and this, I say, is a great step in the right direction.

It is a step that I know the people will approve from ocean to ocean, and I say again that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is to be congratulated for having gotten it before this House.

Let me call the attention of this House to one more proposition. But recently we saw the Washington papers exploiting the fact that over in Philadelphia there was a great meeting of people from all over the United States, and that there they adopted a resolution deploring the idea that anybody would contemplate doing away with the half-and-half plan, and expressing the hope that this half-and-half plan would continue. Who were those people? That was a gathering of the real-estate men of the United States. Who introduced that resolution? One of the most prominent real-estate dealers in the District of Columbia introduced it. Was that an uprising on the part of the people throughout the States from which these real-estate people came? Did the poor people or the people in the middle walks of life in the District of Columbia send that real-estate broker from Washington to the city of Philadelphia to introduce that resolution? I say, No. That resolution had its conception in the minds of the real-estate speculators in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I ask to insert in the RECORD the statement from which I have just read as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BARTLETT). The gentlemen from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] asks unanimous consent to insert the paper to which he has referred in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows.

Annual Federal aid to the District of Columbia.

[This tabulation and analysis sets forth the Federal aid extended toward the municipal expenses of the District of Columbia, distributed pro rata to population among the various States, for the fiscal year 1911–12. The numerous items which constitute the District budget have been reduced to 10 heads following the main lines of expenditure, and grouping under "Miscellaneous" the Federal apportionment, i. e., one-half of such items as "Militia, $80,650; contingent expenses, $101,030; emergency fund, $8,000; marking historical places, $500"; and numerous smaller items. "Schools" carry both salaries and maintenance and new buildings. "Improvements and repairs" carry such items as extensions of streets, paving, assessment and permit work, bridges, and construction other than school buildings. "Streets and sewers" carry street cleaning and all sewer work and maintaining. The groupings are necessarily arbitrary, but the main idea has been to convey a definite statement of the net charge against each State in the Union of the general subsidy paid by the Federal Government toward the purely local and municipal expenses of the District of Columbia.]

Mr. LENROOT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that all debate has been exhausted.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The debate has wandered far afield from the real subject that is before this committee, and I want to discuss for a few moments the merits of the amendment. I do not know but that the committee needs to be refreshed in their recollection of what the amendment really is.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri provides that in certain cases of paving streets there shall be assessed to the abutting property where the pavement is less than 32 feet in width one-half the cost of the improvement, and where the pavement is in excess of 32 feet a different rate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I had supposed that the question of the justice of assessment of special benefits upon property adjoining an improvement was so clearly established that it would not be open to argument. I think the District of Columbia perhaps is the only place in the United States where the system of assessment of special benefits has not been adopted. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], in presenting his amendment, was aware that the system he now proposes in this amendment is now being rapidly discarded by every State in the Union. He proposes what is known as the "front-foot rule" method of assessing benefits, a method, Mr. Chairman, assuming that it is valid and constitutional, that is open to most serious objection. I shall discuss the legal phase of it in just a moment, but I want to call attention now, assuming its validity, to the situation that would exist if this amendment should be adopted.

We all know there are a great many triangles in the city of Washington, where private property in a triangle comes to an apex. With this amendment adopted—the front-foot rule method—one-half the cost assessed to the end of the triangle, will anyone say that it will not mean confiscation?

Mr. BORLAND. Are not the triangles which the gentleman has in mind in many cases owned by the Government?

Mr. LENROOT. But a great many are not.

Mr. BORLAND. There are some at the intersection of avenues, like New Hampshire Avenue, perhaps, and others, but property there is valuable and would not be confiscated.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, the apex of a triangle comes to nothing. Now, does the gentleman think that the 1 foot at the apex of that triangle should stand the same cost for pavement of a street abutting it as other property?

Mr. BORLAND. I have no hesitation in answering that question. Light and accessibility are the great desirable features of property, and people buy those triangles at higher prices on account of not being restricted as to light and accessibility. They pay more for the triangle than they do for the inside piece of property, and it can more easily bear the cost of street improvement.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course at a triangle there are two streets, one on either side. Does the gentleman believe the apex of that triangle may be owned by one individual and a part of it by another, and does he think the apex of the triangle is benefited as much as the base of it is?

Mr. BORLAND. Unquestionably.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I do not care to argue with the gentleman if he thinks that is true.

Mr. BORLAND. The man who owns the base of the triangle can only get light from the two ends, but the man who owns the apex has light all around his premises. If it is business property it is worth for rental purposes two or three times as much, and if it be residence property it is worth a great deal.

Mr. LENROOT. But we are making assessments to property by reason of the improvement.

Mr. BORLAND. We have no right to impose special benefits for the improvement of a street and put some general benefits on it by reason of the location.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that all of those features have been brought out and decided in the Supreme Court of the United States, and these arguments have been raised in many cases.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RODDENBERY). The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment be closed in 30 minutes, 5 minutes of which shall be given to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY], 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR], 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], and 5 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SISSON. I would like to say to the chairman of the subcommittee that I have taken no time during the entire discussion of this bill, and I would like to have 5 minutes.

Mr. BURLESON. Then I would add to that request that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] have 5 minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, there has been an hour and a half discussion, but practically none on the merits of this amendment. I do desire 10 minutes, because I believe I have something of value upon this subject, and it is all upon the amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I quite agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. There has been unlimited time given to several gentlemen who have discussed the amendment to some extent, and who spent most of their time discussing the general features of District legislation which met with their approval or disapproval. Now, this is a very radical and most important piece of legislation, coming on the floor, as it does, without having the approval or the consideration of any great committee of this House. The only opportunity to thrash it out and discuss it on its merits is to be afforded by giving a little time to gentlemen who may have ideas on the subject, and I ask that we give an hour for discussion, and that we give the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] 10 minutes, if he desires.

Mr. BURLESON. Very well, Mr. Chairman. I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment be closed in 1 hour; that an hour be given to this discussion; and that out of that time there be given to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] 10 minutes and to the other gentlemen I have named 5 minutes each, and that I be given 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] asks unanimous consent that all debate close on this amendment and amendments thereto——

Mr. BURLESON. Yes——

The CHAIRMAN. In 1 hour, and that 10 minutes of the time be given to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], 5 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY], and 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Well, Mr. Chairman, I also desire time. I might want 10 minutes. Inasmuch as there will be plenty of time in that hour, I shall want 10 minutes, although I may not use it all.

The CHAIRMAN. And 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR], the remainder of the time to be controlled on recognition.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, one moment. I do not know that I shall consume more than 5 minutes, but there is one phase of the question that I would like to discuss, and I want to have an understanding with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] that if I shall need 10 minutes I shall have such time. I may not want it all, for I shall try to get through in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The remainder of the time to be allotted on recognition by the Chair, the right to obtain extension of time by unanimous consent, of course, prevailing under the rule. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LOBECK. In regard to the matter of apexes, is it not a fact that most of the apexes are in the old part of Washington, and that there are practically none of that character of streets that are now being improved?

Mr. LENROOT. I live away out on Mount Pleasant, and I will say to the gentleman that there are some there.

Mr. LOBECK. I was just looking at the map.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to call attention to another inequality in this amendment. Take, for example, two corners. Upon one corner the owner owns 20 feet in depth. Across the street from him another owner owns 100 feet in depth, and yet under this amendment the assessment will be the same upon the man who owns 20 feet as upon the man that owns 100 feet. No one would say for a moment that those two owners of property were being equally benefited.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with reference to the principle upon which this assessment of special benefits rests, I can do no better than to quote the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Norwood against Baker, in United States Reports 172, page 269, which only reiterates the well-established rule laid down by all the courts. They say in the syllabus:

> The principle underlying special assessments upon private property to meet the cost of public improvements is that the property upon which they are imposed is peculiarly benefited, and therefore that the owners do not in fact pay anything in excess of what they receive by reason of such improvement.

That is the principle, Mr. Chairman, and unless the property owner does receive that special benefit we have no right to impose the cost upon him. We have no right to impose upon him one penny in excess of the special benefit that he receives.

Now the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] made the statement that the front-foot rule method had been indorsed by all the courts and was adopted by all the States. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that 30 years ago that was true. All the States of the Union at that time practically upheld that doctrine, but they are now rapidly getting away from it. Remember, that when we pass an amendment in this form Congress itself arbitrarily determines what assessment shall be paid by property owners in Washington. Such provisions have been sustained, but solely upon the ground that the legislative body itself determined the benefit equaled the cost, but that is purely a legal fiction. The gentleman from Missouri will not claim that Congress is to-day determining that all property that is improved is benefited, regardless of its situation, regardless of its amount, to the extent of one-half of the cost of the improvement. This opinion in Norwood against Baker goes on to say:

> But the power of the legislature in these matters is not unlimited. There is a point beyond which the legislative department, even when exerting the power of taxation, may not go consistently with the citizen's right of property. As already indicated, the principle underlying special assessments to meet the cost of public improvements is that the property upon which they are imposed is peculiarly benefited, and therefore the owners do not, in fact, pay anything in excess of what they receive by reason of such improvement. But the guaranties for the protection of private property would be seriously impaired if it were established as a rule of constitutional law that the imposition by the legislature upon particular private property of the entire cost of a public improvement, irrespective of any peculiar benefits accruing to the owner from such improvement, could not be questioned by him in the courts of the country. It is one thing for the legislature to prescribe it as a general rule that property abutting on a street opened by the public shall be deemed to have been specially benefited by such improvement, and therefore should specially contribute to the cost incurred by the public. It is quite a different thing to lay it down as an absolute rule that such property, whether it is in fact benefited or not by the opening of the street, may be assessed by the front foot for a fixed sum representing the whole cost of the improvement.

Since that decision, Mr. Chairman, in a footnote to Elliott on Roads and Streets, I find that a number of States, following the reasoning in Norwood against Baker, have held the front-foot rule absolutely invalid. Among them are two Texas cases, in Ninety-fourth Federal and Ninety-first Federal Reporter, and an Arkansas case. Elliott, in this work, says:

> Since the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Norwood v. Baker case, there is a reaction in this direction—

That is, against upholding the validity of statutes arbitrarily imposing assessments on the front-foot rule.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in accord with what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] desires to do, and if it were possible, on the spur of the moment, to frame an amendment to his amendment providing that the property owner should have a right to come before the commission and show that he was not specially benefited by the improvement to the extent that it is proposed to assess him, and that would give the commission the right in that case to exempt him from the assessment, or only assess him such sum as he was specially benefited, then I should heartily favor the amendment; but I am not in favor of this proposition, which is a step backward, and which all the other States of the Union that are legislating upon this subject are now discarding.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not true that what you contend for under the decisions as they now exist would really be the case; that is, that the party would have the right to make this showing in his behalf under the terms of this law now?

Mr. LENROOT. Absolutely not; because while reference is made to the statute of 1894, which does provide for a notice of the proposed assessment, and the right of the property owner to make objections, that notice is not provided for at all in the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. TOWNER. The notice is comparatively an unimportant matter. The question is as to his integral right, the right that he would have to be heard as to whether or not such taxation could legally be placed against him.

Mr. LENROOT. I will say to the gentleman that the decisions are uniform, that if the property owner has the right to be heard, he has a constitutional right to be given notice of the hearing, and if the statute does not provide for notice, the statute itself is invalid.

Mr. TOWNER. I agree to that.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, Mr. Chairman, as I have said, I should be glad if an amendment could be offered; but realizing that it is a technical subject, I have not had the time to venture to prepare such an amendment, because it must provide for notice, and must provide for power upon the part of the commission to determine the matter of benefits.

I wish very much that this matter might go over until Monday, so that this situation could be cleared up. I think when the gentleman from Missouri comes to consider the matter carefully and consider the decisions on the subject he will agree with me that there should be an amendment along the lines I have suggested.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the legal propositions involved in this matter have been ably presented to the committee. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin exaggerates, perhaps, the necessity for the particular act which grants the power to make the assessment also include the notice as a part of that act.

However, I should have no objection whatever to that amendment being made to this act. I desire to call attention to a few of the objections that are made to this proposition. In the first place it is suggested that this legislation ought not now, during the closing days of the session, be brought to the consideration of Congress—that there is not time enough to consider it. I presume that objection might always be made, but let me suggest to gentlemen that this method of taxation, that this proposition of placing the burden for paving the streets and properly surfacing them on the adjoining property owners, is the almost universal rule in this country. This proposition is only for the purpose of bringing this city in uniformity with other municipalities in this country. It is not a new proposition. It is a proposition that has been before every court in the United States. There has been a great diversity of laws on this proposition, and the principle has been definitely settled that where there are any benefits that may be shown to accrue to the adjoining property owner by reason of the improvement, the right of taxation by this method exists; and further, that they will not go into a close and careful computation as to the amount of the benefit when it comes to determining whether the right of taxation exists.

It has been further suggested, Mr. Chairman, in opposition to this legislation, that it will be a burden upon the poor man and not upon the rich, who have already received that benefit. Let me suggest to gentlemen that this objection may be urged at any time in the future, and if it were a valid objection it might always be urged and therefore prevent any legislation whatever being had. It is time, I think, and I am sure the country will conclude, that the taxation of the city of Washington should be placed upon a fair and equitable basis. It is time that the changes that ought fairly to be made should be made. It is time that we should make the property of the city bear a fair burden of the taxation of the city. It is not necessary for us to offer special inducements to those who come here for the purpose of escaping taxation, and therefore I believe that we should now adopt a system of taxation which is fair and just and is uniform with that of the whole country. We should begin to-day to do that which it is our duty to do, to see that the property in this city bears at least a fair proportion of the taxation for its public improvements. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I made a statement from recollection a little while ago, and, after all, when one who has had long service in the House depends on his recollection it is not always easy to get things accurate, but, in substance, I did get what I said accurate. The gentleman from Kentucky, no doubt in the best of faith, attacked the legislation of 1902. His attack was not, in my judgment, well founded.

Let us see what the conditions were in 1902. By decisions of the courts, by the practice in 1902 before the act was amended, while the half-and-half act provided for the taxation of personal property, it was practically a dead letter. Prior to 1902 personal property paid, in round numbers, $147,000. The law was amended in 1903, and then it yielded $372,000. In 1904, $632,000; in 1905, $662,000; 1906, $699,000; and in 1912, $1,100,000. Assessors were removable by the District Commissioners if they did not perform their functions, but while the dollar and a half law was on the statute books the assessments ran all awry.

In 1902, under the law prior to the amendment that was passed upon the appropriation bill, the taxes received were $2,858,000. The very first year, the law being enacted in June, real estate yielded in 1903, $3,250,000; in 1904, $3,259,000; in 1905, $3,315,000; in 1906, $3,575,000; in 1912, $4,883,000. That is the same law which my friend from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] complains has changed the law of 1877. There is the plain tale.

Why was this done? It did not belong to the Committee on Appropriations, but the Committee on Appropriations was asked to recommend further advances to the District. The District was falling behind. The year before this act was enacted in 1902 the District of Columbia owed a floating debt of more than $1,000,000, with additional obligations in sight under legislation in process of enactment on reports from the District Committee which increased that floating debt in 1903 to more than three millions and a half. That was what they asked. The House struck it out, and struck out the enacting clause, and yet the floating debt was to increase. Under spur of the necessity of the situation the Committee on Appropriations reported on the District of Columbia appropriation bill that year a provision which required a reduction of the appropriations carried for salaries in the District of Columbia appropriation bill by 10 per cent, unless there should be enacted during that year a personal-tax law. The provision went through the House of Representatives on the District appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1903—and an amendment providing for a reformation in making assessments. The Senate struck it out and substituted therefor a general real estate and personal tax law, which was finally agreed upon in conference and, being agreed to by the two Houses, now constitutes the law.

[The time of Mr. CANNON having expired, by unanimous consent, on the request of Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, his time was extended for 10 minutes, not to be included within the time already arranged for by the committee.]

There was an act that provided for a personal tax, which by practice, backed up by decisions that I have not now time to discuss, cut the personal tax down to almost nothing. The machinery did not operate. That was the condition. We put on an amendment for a reduction of 10 per cent on the salaries, knowing that if anything would move the personnel of the District it would be a reduction of salaries, to take effect and to remain in effect unless a provision were enacted into law providing for a personal tax, or the collection of a personal tax. We put that provision on under a special rule. The Senate struck out both provisions. It went to conference, and we obtained the legislation I refer to. I just want to read a few words from some broken remarks I made on that conference report on June 28, 1902:

> The Committee on Appropriations under the organic law was confronted with this condition and with these estimates. It commenced the preparation of its bill in December, expecting to report it before the holidays, but with this condition it deferred consideration. It waited through December, January, February, and March for legislation. Through the public prints and by announcement inspired from another body, and from the committee that had legislative jurisdiction in another body, we were led to infer that the proper committees would give legislation for an increase of taxation. We waited and waited and waited in vain, until finally, when it was patent that the Congress was to close without any effort for legislation, the Committee on Appropriations reported this bill. It contained a provision cutting down 10 per cent all the salaries of employees in the District, and by special rule we put on a provision providing the machinery to enforce the law of 1877, so that we could get tax revenues from personal property.

The Senate struck out both provisions, and it went to conference. We obtained a compromise bill, which for the first time placed a tax of 4 per cent upon the gross receipts of the banks, street railway companies, and building associations. We doubled the excise tax for retail, and so forth. That is the law to-day—not as much as it ought to be. I still think that sufficient tax is not laid upon personalty, and perhaps not upon the banks and street railway companies, but I shall not take time now to refer to that matter.

There is the whole story. What has happened in the meantime? Under that law, with the rapidly increasing appropriations for the District of Columbia, we have paid almost $2,800,000 of that floating debt, and it would not have been paid, but would have been constantly increasing, if that law had not been enacted. This bill succeeded in wiping that out, and, in addition to that, we paid the District's part for the construction of the Municipal Building.

We have extended our sewer system at great cost. We have had to do with our water improvements at a large expense and many other exceedingly great expenses; $3,800,000 went out for the filtration plant. Now listen:

In the judgment of your committee, the conferees on the part of the House, the Senate bill did not raise enough money. We needed more, and after a long conference we got something of a concession, the best we could do.

And then I speculated about what would be raised, and much more was raised under that taxation than I anticipated. I submitted some more remarks and said that this was not a labor of love, which I have not time to read. It was a condition that was forced upon the Committee on Appropriations, over which I had the honor at that time to preside—a unanimous committee—and forced upon the House, not under the general rules of the House, but by a special order bringing this whole matter before the House and sending to the Senate a provision that moved the Senate to act, and it did act, and I said here that I had no pride in this legislation; I was not an expert about the matter. We amended the law. We put the assessment board to be appointed by the President for a term of three years, and provided they should not be removed except for cause, and that the court should pass upon that cause. Why? Because the poor assessor has about as much chance, with all the influences, social—I will not say corrupt—and otherwise, about as much chance, unless he has protection, as a cat in hell without claws. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, I have told you merely this passing history; I have hastily revived my recollection. I have said all I desire to say; I will not again refer to my remarks touching taxation by the linear foot for street improvements; I have already spoken of that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I wish to ask the gentleman to restate the reason for giving the assessors a practical life tenure of office?

Mr. CANNON. The reason was this, that with all the social influences and with all the power arising from every standpoint that citizens of the District had to affect the District Commissioners, with a press that was in harmony and very properly in harmony because here the press lives, the assessor who was seeking to do his duty and keep his oath, his tenure of office was liable to be very, very short, and therefore we put in that provision in extremis, and I think, upon the whole, it has acted very well.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Well, I am glad to have the explanation from the gentleman as to why the assessors were given this practical life tenure. It has been suspected by myself, I will say, and believed by many, that another provision in this same bill creates the assessors as an excise board, and, as I have just said, a great many people believe they were given practically life tenure of office, because the powers of an excise board were conferred upon them, and suitable men, when once gotten in for that purpose, might be held indefinitely.

Mr. CANNON. Well, it was for the protection of the assessors. It was to provide, starting in with proper and honest assessors, that they could not be discharged except for cause.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to congratulate the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] upon the enactment of that legislation under the circumstances which the record shows it was then enacted, and I want to say also that in serving on the Committee on Appropriations with the gentleman from Illinois that he is faithful, cautious, and always strong, and is one of the most careful legislators on the Committee on Appropriations, and on the subject of appropriations he is absolutely sound. So I want to congratulate him, and it is not amiss to say he has rendered many services of like kind and character to the people of the United States. I differ with him, however, in reference to the position he takes on the amendment before the committee. Under the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] the property owner would pay one-fourth of the street expenses; that is, the property owner on one side would pay one-fourth and the property owner on the other side would pay one-fourth and the Federal Government, under the half-and-half system would pay one-fourth and the District taxes would bear the burden of one-fourth. I believe that the evidence that it is not unfair to the property owners of the District of Columbia is because so many of the great cities require the property owners to pay all of the street pavement in front of their property, and I presume that those people in the cities who have a direct vote upon the municipal officers and do vote for the municipal officers secure in the main practically the government which they think best. We ought to be peculiarly careful, as Members of Congress, in enacting legislation for this District, because they do not have representation here.

No property owner should be done an injustice, but I believe that under the present system of taxation that the small property owner could not in any sense of the word be injured. But under the system which prevails it inures absolutely to the benefit of the real estate man who is improving property for sale. For example, you take a large quantity of land which is farm land now, and a company is organized for the purpose of developing the property; if they have sufficient influence to have streets built, it costs them absolutely nothing, for the United States now owns the water system; and when they plat the land the water is placed under each lot without expense to the property, and the street is built without expense to the property. Land thus bought by the acre is sold by the square foot. The real estate speculator in the District charges the property with all these improvements which have cost him nothing, and in addition thereto enjoys the unearned increment. Under the present iniquitous system he enjoys all this without expense to himself and without paying one cent for a house. The land has been made valuable for homes out of Government money, and these real estate men get the entire benefit—not the poor home seeker or Government clerk or Government employee. They then charge the property with all the money that has been expended by the Federal Government, and farm land is sold after these improvements are made wholly out of the Federal Treasury and the District treasury, and the real estate speculator gets the entire benefit; and he charges up to the small home owner who desires to buy a lot the entire expenditure in the nature of improvements. In addition to that, the natural increase and the rise in values, by virtue of opening it up to settlement and building the streets, is also charged to the small property owner. He has to pay for them under this present system, whereas if the system were changed the property owner opening up property would be compelled himself to pay one-half of the street improvement. The result would be that the unimproved real estate would be developed less rapidly and the small home owner would have infinitely more opportunity to buy the unimproved real estate and suffer the inconveniences a while, and then, when the street is opened up and enough settlement is there to justify municipal improvements going to that neighborhood, the poor property owner and the poor home owner would get the benefit of the unearned increment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, there was an understanding that if I should not complete my remarks within the time, I should have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that by special order 50 minutes of time was disposed of, leaving 10 minutes undisposed of. Gentlemen have been recognized in order, and have consumed that 10 minutes. There now remains no time in which extensions can be had. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent?

Mr. SISSON. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that I had an understanding with the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes, not to be taken out of the time under the order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] be extended for five minutes, not to be taken out of the time under the order already made by the committee. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, now this debate has taken quite a wide range. Nothing has been said about the amount of property owned by the Government in the District of Columbia. I do not know what percentage of area the Government owns, but it has been intimated here that by virtue of the ownership of the streets by the Federal Government, the Federal Government should pay the taxes on the ground covered by the streets. I do not know of a municipality, a town, or a village in the world where there has ever been a tax placed upon the property owned by the city, and because the title to the street happens to be in the Federal Government I do not think that it will be seriously argued here the Government should pay taxes on the streets. It has also been argued that because the Government owned so much property here and so much area here that for that reason the Federal Government should pay a part of the municipal taxes. I do not believe that argument is tenable, because the presence of the Federal Government in this city is what gives the value to all real estate and makes it possible for this to be a city, and the people living in the District of Columbia, doing business here, educating their children here, get a hundredfold more benefit from the Federal Government than do those people who do not happen to be so fortunate as to live within the District. So I do not believe that that argument is tenable, because in no State does the State pay taxes in the capital of the State on property owned by the State. It has been suggested that this Capital be removed nearer the center of population. If St. Louis would duplicate the buildings and duplicate the property we have here I would favor moving the Capital to that city, being, as it is, in the center of the United States. It could well afford to duplicate those buildings and have the Capital City moved there, and there would be no contention whatever that the Federal Government would be a curse to that city. I am getting tired of the continuous complaint coming from the citizens of the District of Columbia and coming from the real estate people of the District that Congress is penurious in dealing with District matters. We are by far more liberal than we ought to be.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. California gave $17,000,000 to get an exposition located there for only a little while.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] has stated to me that the State of California gave $17,000,000 for an exposition to be located there but for a short time. I do not blame the people of the District of Columbia so much. I presume if other people would live here as they do, they would soon become educated as are the people of the District of Columbia. I am criticizing the system which Congress is maintaining in this District. If you would change it, you would hear a different cry. Cut out the half-and-half system.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in accord with the purpose of this amendment. And yet the amendment may not do equal justice to all the citizens. But it is hardly possible to pass any law that will do equal and exact justice to all. This amendment, however, is predicated upon a principle that is practically right and one that a great many of the States of the Union have adopted and are carrying out successfully.

Some objection has been made that in some of the States of the Union legislation of this kind has been stricken down by the courts. That would not be the case here. In such States, where decisions of that kind have been rendered, it will be found, doubtless, by an examination of them, that the legislation came in conflict with some provision of the constitutions of those States, and for that reason the law in those States was held to be invalid.

Now, if the citizen is to pay for the improvements of the street, as provided for in this amendment, he will take an interest in the making of the improvements; he will see that the proceeds derived from the taxation of his property are economically and wisely expended and that the improvements are well made.

Objection has been made also that some of the property may be taxed unjustly on account of this provision; that a valuable piece of property will have to bear its proportion and that a piece of property not so valuable will have to bear its proportion. Mr. Chairman, adjoining properties will bear the same burden fairly distributed under this amendment, and, consequently, will receive the same proportion of benefits from it. Therefore it will work fairly as to the two kinds of property, and the owners will not suffer any injustice from the adoption of such an amendment as this.

Now, I think that every Member in this House is desirous of improving the city of Washington, but it is unfair that the owners of property in the city of Washington shall receive an increase of value in their property by the payment of taxes collected from people all over the Union. As the law now stands, the property owner of California is taxed for the purpose of improving the property—increasing the value of the property owned by a citizen of the city of Washington; and while that far-distant citizen has a pride in the city of Washington, still he ought not to be taxed in the same proportion as the owner of property in Washington is taxed for the purpose of improving the value of property here in the city of Washington. Such a course is manifestly unfair.

Now, in the improvement of streets it will bring about a better system of improvements. It will not improve the streets out in the parts of the District of Columbia where there are no residents and no public requirement for such improvement, but it will curtail that improvement and improve the streets only in such localities where the property is built up and the population dense. Upon the plan now employed it is unfair to the property owner in one locality that he be taxed, as he is now taxed, for the purpose of building up the improvements out in another locality far distant from him. Under the method proposed by this amendment the property owners adjoining the street pay one-half of the improvement, the Government one-fourth, and the District of Columbia one-fourth; and I take it that the amendment will work fairly to all the country if it is adopted, as I hope it will be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS and Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio rose.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I will yield in favor of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR], who is a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] is recognized.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I am not in favor of this amendment, not because I am not in favor of an equitable distribution of the cost of improvements among the citizens who enjoy those improvements, but for the reason that I am opposed to vital legislation being catapulted on the floor of the House without any consideration at the hands of any of the great committees that may have jurisdiction over it and then passed or rejected merely on statements made and theories propounded by gentlemen who are practically relying upon their personal opinions fortified by mere guesswork.

I am glad to have heard the argument of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. I am familiar with the case of Norwood against Baker. I know a good deal about the front-foot rule. I live in Ohio, and in my home city we pay for our improvements under that rule. That city is laid out in squares and not laid out in angles, as is Washington There is not a city in the Union of which I have any knowledge where the front-foot rule would work such gross inequalities and injustices as it would in the city of Washington.

Now, that is one thing that a committee, and a very able committee, should consider before we write into the statute books a radical change from our present system of taxation. Why, Mr. Chairman, when the present law providing for the half-and-half system and the $1.50 rate of taxation was enacted it became a law only after a great committee, a joint committee of the House and Senate, composed of very able members, had spent months of investigation and had filed a very elaborate and complete report upon which the legislation was based.

Although my service in Congress will soon be over, I stand ready to-day to vote for anything along the lines of just and equitable taxation and vote to see that the citizens pay their just proportion of the benefits peculiar to them as individuals. I am not opposing that, but I am opposing this method of trying to enact legislation without proper and intelligent consideration.

Here is another inequality. The city is full of these triangles which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] mentioned. Some gentleman stated in his argument that they were in the old portion of the city. If a man knows anything about the new portions of the city, I guarantee he will find more jogs and triangles by far in the new portions of the city than in the older parts of the city.

I happen to have a map here that was furnished to our committee while we were considering street improvements. We are asked now under this amendment to compel those who desire streets in front of their property, if this amendment becomes a law, to pay a proportion of that cost. Now, what effect is that going to have? They are not only going to pay one-fourth or one-half, but as repairs are not covered in this amendment, they must still go on and pay their regular $1.50 rate of taxation toward repairs and maintenance of streets already laid down in front of their properties.

Here is a map of the District of Columbia. All that part marked in brown has completed improved streets. The very heart and core of the great District of Columbia is to-day improved permanently with asphalt streets. Those streets, with the repairs put on them out of the general revenues, are good for not less than 20 years, and we now propose to make the people who are beginning to live out in the part of the District shown in white on this map, the poor clerks and small householders, proceed immediately to pay for their street improvements, while for 20 years the millions of dollars of real property in the heart of Washington will not have to pay one cent toward the upkeep of those streets. We relieve entirely, except for repairs, those gentlemen who own the great central part of the city until their streets are worn out.

Let us look this amendment squarely in the face. Let us send it to a great committee. The chairman of the District Committee is here to-day. Many of its members have been on the floor throughout the discussion of this bill. Let them come in, after a careful consideration of this great subject, and present a just and equitable bill, and if I am in Congress it will receive my support. But I will not vote for one separate amendment which on its face lacks equity and shows that the great mass of the people will not be affected by it for many years to come, while those who can least afford to bear it will begin to pay immediately.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman permit one interruption?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman from Kentucky stated that you could now assess the benefits that have accrued to the property owners by virtue of street improvements. Do you believe that could be done now?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Do you mean that you could assess back the benefits on the finished work?

Mr. SISSON. That is what I am asking.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I do not think you could.

Mr. SISSON. I just wanted to ask about that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. This amendment does not provide for it.

Mr. SISSON. I am speaking of the present law.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I am giving my off-hand judgment, which, as a rule, is not very good when things like this are sprung suddenly, that you could not do it.

Mr. SISSON. My reason for asking the question was that if that could be done, then if the law was enforced you could assess these benefits against these recently improved streets.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. If that could be done there would be some equity in it, but it is not proposed to be done in this amendment, and a proposition to amend the amendment would simply result in a hodgepodge.

Mr. SISSON. If the difficulty lies in a failure to enforce the existing law, then the thing to do is to enforce it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. We are enforcing the present law, as far as I am able to find out.

Now, I want to speak of one thing that everybody seems to be worried about. That is, that the people of the country are paying something, or, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] says, are paying a subsidy to the citizens of the District of Columbia. I live in the State of Ohio, which, according to the figures presented by the chairman of the District Committee [Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky], pays about the third largest amount.

New York, Pennsylvania, possibly Illinois and Ohio are the ones paying the largest amounts according to his population figures, which are absolutely worthless, because we collect no per capita taxes. If you—living outside this District—do not want to pay anything toward the support of the District of Columbia or the support of the Federal Government, do not smoke, drink, chew, or import anything, and you are out of it.

I never have heard a citizen of my district but what was proud to a great degree of the city of Washington, which they consider to be the city of the whole people of the United States, and they want what little money the Government sees fit to spend upon it expended in such a way as to make it the greatest capital of any nation in the world. I do not believe one Member of this House has ever had a complaint or a petition from his constituents asking that they be relieved from any burden caused by the Government participation in the expenses of the District of Columbia. I have had hundreds, possibly thousands, of visitors from my home city and county, and every one of them left here proud of what they saw had been accomplished, and willing to see greater things done toward the beautification and upbuilding of the greatest capital of the greatest nation in the world.

I am against this amendment, but I am not against just and equitable taxation for improvements peculiarly beneficial to individuals in this District or any other place. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, it is an admitted fact that no intangible personal property in the District of Columbia is taxed, and that there is a thousand dollars exemption on tangible personal property. Stocks, bonds, mortgages, money, it makes no difference how many millions in value, pay absolutely no tax in this District whatever.

Now, if there was a corresponding burden upon the property that is taxed equivalent to that failure to tax intangible property that is lost to the District by not being taxed, we could excuse such a thing. But here in the District of Columbia real estate, the only thing that is taxed except tangible personal property, is permitted by law to be taxed at two-thirds of its value. It is utterly impossible for an assessor, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] said, to stand against the pressure brought to bear on him and assess it for more than that. Therefore, taxes on the only species of property, real estate, that is taxed at all is $1 a hundred, or $10 a thousand, in the finest improved city in the United States.

Take my own State and district; the largest town in my district does not exceed 20,000 inhabitants, and the tax upon practically the same assessed value is $3.45 a hundred dollars. I do not mean the city tax, but all taxes combined. Why should a man, because he lives in the finest city in the United States, yea, the finest city in the world, be further compensated by reducing his taxes? Just as long as the half-and-half plan exists we will have this anomalous condition on us. That is the fundamental error of the whole thing. It may have been wise to do it when it was done, but we will have these people continuously knocking at the door of Congress for increased appropriations for the District of Columbia while the percentage burden of taxation is being reduced.

I say that the man who lives in the District of Columbia and owns his home ought to pay more taxes than in any other place on earth, because he is getting more for his money than anywhere else. But the purpose that seems to lie behind the people of the District of Columbia is to get rid of paying for city benefits, which they get in a greater volume than the people in any other city on the face of the earth. The only way to do justice is to levy a just, reasonable, and fair tax upon the people of the District of Columbia, both upon the real, tangible, and intangible personal property, regardless of the appropriations made; make it uniform and let them pay it into the Treasury of the United States, and then let Congress make the appropriations with reference to the city's needs, and then what these fair and just taxes do not pay, pay the balance out of the United States Treasury. Then you will stop this eternal knocking at the doors of Congress and this nagging at us to buy this frog pond and that gulch and other useless forms of real estate because the District can pay its part without increasing its burden and because the volume of values must and always will increase.

There is no reason why this Capital should be a great and populous city. What benefit is Chevy Chase to the National Government as a seat of government? What benefit is it to Members of Congress to have a clubhouse away out in the woods while our people pay for part of it? It is absurd, it is wrong, it is illogical, and it is robbery of our constituents. The people here ought to bear these expenses because they get the exclusive benefits of same.

There is a necessity for this amendment so that these great avenues and extensive projects may be kept up, at least in part, by the people of the District of Columbia. The morality usually voiced by the people here has been a dollar-and-cent morality, an exchange of their rights as citizens for a mess of pottage in reduced taxation called the organic act. It is organic folly, and we will never get rid of these troubles until we wipe that statute off the books and let everybody pay their taxes according to what they own, and let the Government pay the balance of whatever appropriations may be made regardless of ratio. [Applause.]

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I have been a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia for nearly two years, and I appear on this occasion as a kind of amicus curiæ for that committee. Ever since I have been on that committee somebody has appeared asking for an extension of some road, an improvement of some highway, and I have felt that if these fellows that were appearing there had to pay the expenses of the improvements they would not besiege the committee so persistently as they do, and therefore as a friend of that committee I am in favor of the principle, at least, of this measure.

While I have the floor, however, I wish to make a few general remarks upon this subject. I have for the last 30 days been listening to experts in this city upon the question of real-estate values, and if there is any one thing that has been established beyond all doubt and all controversy it is that real estate in the city of Washington is springing and leaping in values as it is nowhere else in the United States. We had one little piece of property down here upon which was centered the thought of this committee, which had sprung in value from $18 a square foot to $50 a square foot in a little over three years. This naturally led me to inquire the cause of this remarkable increase in the value of real estate in the city of Washington. Everybody who is familiar with real estate values knows that the question of taxation is an important factor. It always figures in the value. This led me to a general inquiry, and I addressed letters to the mayor of every large city of the United States inquiring as to the assessment of the property in other cities, and without going into detail I might say this, that while the assessment on real estate property in the city of Washington is 10 mills, the average of cities of this size and class in the United States is 22 mills. In other words, real estate assessments in the United States is more than twice what it is in the city of Washington.

Take, for instance, my own city. We pay 22 mills on every dollar of real value of real estate in our city. In addition to that, every man has to pay for special improvements that are put in front of his property. In Washington that is all absorbed by the General Government and by general taxation. That is not fair. There has been a good deal of talk here about the fact that in the District of Columbia there is a large amount of property belonging to the Federal Government. I undertake to say that the ownership of that property does not throw a single burden upon the property of the individual owner in the District of Columbia. [Applause.]

Another thing has been called to my attention in making this investigation, and that is this—that the people of the city of Washington, per capita, are the wealthiest people in the United States. The average wealth of the citizens of Washington is $2,300, and in the next highest city it is $1,800. That shows that the people of Washington are at least able to bear their share in carrying on the burdens of their purely local government. I have given a good deal of thought and attention to this whole matter during the last month. I have looked at it from almost every angle, but I can see no reason in the world why the citizens of Washington should not maintain and control and pay the bills for their own local government, just like any other city does. I have addressed letters to the capitals of all of the principal countries of the world, and so far as I can find there is not another capital in the world that is subsidized by its General Government like the city of Washington is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa be permitted to proceed for five minutes, not to be included in the general order heretofore made.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from Iowa is very pronounced in the opinion that the entire amount of money necessary to maintain the District government should be paid out of local taxation. Does the gentleman from Iowa couple with that proposition the right of self-government in the District of Columbia?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes; I think they are two things that should go hand in hand.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then, instead of the amendment that is being discussed here, as well as other questions that are not included in the amendment, the whole question calls for general legislation of the greatest possible importance not only to the District of Columbia but to the country; and does the gentleman think that that legislation should be enacted by an amendment on an appropriation bill?

Mr. PROUTY. My answer to that would be this, in a general way: I am engaged in preparing a bill, which I will have the pleasure of presenting to this House, which covers all of these questions; but as this goes in part along the line I am in favor of, I propose to do all I can to get just as far as I can, and I will frankly say to the Members of the House that I will call on them to the best of my ability to consider a general proposition for reorganizing the entire system of government in the city of Washington. In other words, after having looked this question over from every corner, I do not believe there is any way that these questions can all be solved except by an absolute divorce between the District of Columbia in its purely municipal affairs and the Federal Treasury. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. REDFIELD. I did not mean to interrupt the gentleman, but I would like to be recognized for five minutes when he has finished.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, there is no greater wrong in my opinion that a sovereign power can exercise than that of taxing one class of people for the benefit of another, and the first thought of every candid and sincere Congressman or legislator must be on the line of so adjusting things that unreasonable burdens will not fall upon anybody. As has been called to your attention by the chairman of our distinguished committee, not the distinguished chairman, but the chairman of our distinguished committee [laughter and applause] we not only pay all of these burdens at home in sustaining all of these affairs, but we come down here with our contribution to the people of the city of Washington. My people at home pay for their own schooling, pay for their own policing, pay for all those affairs, and then we come down here and throw into the laps of people who are wealthier per capita than my people a certain portion for the purpose of providing water, light, and everything else.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. PROUTY. With pleasure. I probably will have to ask a minute or two more.

Mr. CANNON. I hope it will be granted, but my recollection is from a careful examination that the citizens of Iowa per capita are the wealthiest people in the United States, and I believe in the world.

Mr. PROUTY. I accept the compliment, but unfortunately that only applies to the agricultural portion; I am talking about cities of the size of Washington.

Mr. CANNON. It includes all of them.

Mr. PROUTY. We are wealthy out there; we admit it; but we have not reached that point of generosity where we are willing to take from our own treasury and pour it into the laps of fellows who are just as well fixed as we are.

Mr. SISSON. You want to keep your riches.

Mr. PROUTY. What I wanted to state is, so you will understand it, for I speak with deliberation, that there is no city of the size in the group between 300,000 and 400,000 in the United States where the individuals per capita are as wealthy as they are in the city of Washington. That being true, what excuse can anybody give for taking money from the people of some other city and bringing it down here to pay the expenses of the fellows who live in this city.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] rise?

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak for a few moments on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise the gentleman that under a unanimous agreement the time has been fixed for debate and except by unanimous consent——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may address the committee for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The understanding of the Chair is that that is not to be deducted from the order the committee has already made.

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I should not trouble the committee in this debate were it not that I happen to have had experience in administering a law of this kind much more severe in its terms, and can speak from experience. In the Borough of Brooklyn, in the city of New York, the law requires that the entire expenses of all public improvements of every nature having to do with street improvements, sewers, pavements, and everything of that kind, shall be borne wholly by the abutting property owners, the extent of the assessment area on each side being one-half the abutting block unless by special enactment. The only protection against confiscation which the property owner has under this severe statute is that the city has no right of its own to begin improvements. They must be initiated by the property owners themselves through a special proceeding provided for that purpose, and in the cases where assessments are very large—I had under my care a single sewer that cost something over $3,000,000—in such cases the law now permits the carrying of the assessment over a term of years, with interest thereon, but the entire cost of all these improvements is willingly paid by the property owners, and it does not in the faintest degree restrict the activities and the growth of the city in the construction of public works. As a matter of fact, in one year I had under my care some 80 contractors at work doing work of this character under the very onerous—or, rather, the very drastic—provision that I have described.

When I came to Washington from that experience, and found in the outlying parts of this city that the city, supported in part by the United States Government, was making improvements in streets, the benefit of which immediately accrued to the abutting property, but without expense to it, it seemed to me, and it seems to me now, one of the most shocking things I ever heard of the kind. I think this amendment would be better if they—the property owners—paid it all. If they paid it all, then they should have the right to initiate, because it is not proper that the city should impose upon property owners such a tax of its own will without any voice upon their part. And in large improvements I think they might be given a term of years in which to pay, as, for example, in the case of a great trunk sewer, and things of that kind. But the principle of this amendment is perfectly sound. My property is benefited by a street; not yours a mile away, but mine. I expect to get that benefit back, and I ought to pay, and cheerfully pay, without any question of justice or injustice, what I am squarely getting back through the proceeds of that work. That is the practice elsewhere, and it ought to prevail here. [Applause.]

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, the issue presented is quite simple and easily understood. Under the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] a change of plan in the payment for the construction and reconstruction of streets and avenues within the District of Columbia is proposed. The present plan authorized by law for paving of streets and avenues in the District requires that one-half of the expense shall be met by the District government and one-half by the General Government. The first question that arises in one's mind is, Is that just and fair? One way to arrive at a satisfactory answer to the query as to whether it is just and fair is to look to other cities and see what plan has been adopted in such cities in dealing with the subject matter under discussion.

It has been made manifest by repeated statements here that in an overwhelming majority of cities in the United States the entire cost of the construction and the reconstruction of streets is borne by the abutting property owner on the thoroughfare being improved. Such being the case, one is justified in concluding that there is nothing radically unfair in the proposition to impose a small part of such expense on abutting property owners in the District of Columbia. There is nothing novel in the plan to accomplish this result as outlined in the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri. He utilizes the same plan that exists in other cities of the United States for assessments against property owners. The only question remaining to be decided is whether the percentage of this cost to be assessed is too high. Is what he proposes unjust and unfair? What does he propose? He proposes that the abutting property owner, the man who owns the property to be benefited, shall pay one-fourth of the cost of the pavement on the street in front of such property. In other cities, as has been said, such property owner frequently has to pay the entire cost of such improvement. In some cases they pay half, but here it is proposed that such owner shall pay only one-fourth of the cost of the paving.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. It is one-half of the cost. Where the property owner is charged to the center of the street he pays one-half of the cost.

Mr. BURLESON. One-half of the cost to the street-car track, or the center of the street, one-fourth of the entire cost of the street in front of his property.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. But in other cities the person also pays only 50 per cent, because he only pays to the center of the street.

Mr. BURLESON. There is no difference between us. The proposition to be determined then is, is this too much; if so, offer an amendment to reduce it. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] has just suggested that he thinks the abutting property owner ought to pay all the cost of such street construction. I do not think he ought to pay it all in the city of Washington. Personally I do not want to completely abandon the half-and-half plan of paying municipal expenses that prevails in this city, but I want to call the attention of those who favor the existing plan that there are certain inequalities growing out of this plan which must be corrected or the whole plan will be either abolished and abandoned or radically changed. There is no doubt about that. I am a friend of the city of Washington. I do not want the present half-and-half plan abandoned, but I do desire certain inequalities, certain injustices, that result therefrom changed. These injustices against the whole people of the United States should be speedily eliminated or changed, in order that the plan itself may be saved. Personally I do not believe that the people of the United States should pay anything toward defraying the cost of schooling the children of the District of Columbia.

I believe that ought to be changed. There are also other injustices resulting from this plan, and if we correct these inequalities we will continue under the present half-and-half system until Washington is made and maintained as the most beautiful city in the world. Mr. Chairman, I appeal now to this committee to act cautiously in this matter. If we do act advisedly, act in the interest of the city, by adopting this amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], we may prevent more radical action in the future. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield just for one question? As chairman of the subcommittee in charge of the bill is it not a fact that this very amendment in the last days of our consideration of the bill was presented by you as chairman to the committee and discussed, and it was unanimously decided that it was inopportune to bring forth radical changes in legislation in an appropriation bill, and that this was conveyed to the full committee which agreed unanimously with us?

Mr. BURLESON. That is measurably true. It is a matter that we were afraid we ought not to undertake at this time. But as far as the amendment is concerned I want to say that it was prepared by one of the most competent engineer officers ever brought to the service of this District, the assistant engineer commissioner, Capt. Brooke. He had also the assistance of the law officers of the District in preparing this amendment.

Mr. TAYOR of Ohio. But not by a lawyer, or by anybody familiar with taxation.

Mr. BURLESON. It was prepared after full consultation with the law officer of this city, and it will stand the test in the courts. Take that from me. [Applause.]

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to make this statement that the action was not entirely unanimous in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee in closing this debate to a fact that was referred to here by the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. BURLESON], that this amendment is not a hasty suggestion, but has been carefully prepared by an engineer officer, Capt. Brooke, the assistant engineer officer of the District. It has been prepared with a view of articulating into and operating according to the machinery of the law now governing the District of Columbia. It is an adaptation of a principle that is in force in the District of Columbia in regard to sidewalks and alleys, and has been enforced and passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States. It simply extends that principle to another class of improvements, to wit, the surfacing of the roadways of the streets.

There is not any question but that legally the proposition is sound and that we can go at least as far as making the abutting property owner pay one-half of the cost of those improvements. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] recalled the case of Norwood against Baker, which was decided in 1898, and which caused a great deal of confusion at that time in the assessment laws of the various States. The opinion in the case of Norwood against Baker went away beyond the facts involved in that particular case in criticizing the front-foot rule or any other arbitrary form of assessing the benefits. Immediately after the decision in that case there went to the court from Kansas City the case of the Barber Asphalt Co. against French, in which case the question of the legality of the front-foot rule of assessment in paving improvements was squarely presented. The issue had not been clearly defined in the Norwood-Baker case. The front-foot rule was sustained by the Supreme Court of Missouri and by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Barber Asphalt Co. against French, as reported in One hundred and eighty-first United States.

In that case the opinion not only reviewed every preceding case involving street improvements, but even specially mentioned the case of Mattingly against the District of Columbia, in which the Supreme Court sustained the very law that we are now proposing to extend to street improvements. That will be found on page 345 of the opinion. Then the court proceeds to say that the opinion in the case of Norwood against Baker should go no further than to leave to every man the constitutional right under the fourteenth amendment to go into a court of equity and enjoin the municipal authorities in any rare case of confiscation that may occur. That is true with respect to this law. A man has the right now to go into a United States court of equity and enjoin a case that happens to be a case of confiscation.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman knows that that was a decision by a divided court?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman knows that Mr. Justice Harlan dissented?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. And that two other justices dissented?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. That has been true since the rendering of the court's opinion in the case of the Barber Asphalt Co. against French. It leaves the question in such a position that where a man feels he is damaged he can go into court and litigate the question himself. It is now a question whether you will have a general law on the subject or whether you will put upon the property owner the necessity in each case of going to a jury and determining the damages in each case. You must either have a general plan of ascertaining damages, as under this front-foot rule, which works well in the majority of cases, or you must submit every particular case to a jury and show the exact damages and benefits to each piece of property. Under the latter plan of apportionment the burden of taxation is so increased by these expenses that it becomes a substantial injustice to the property owner instead of an act of justice.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Can the gentleman furnish any authority for the proposition that it requires a jury to settle these questions? The commission decide them.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; but the Constitution of the United States says it shall not be done without due process of law, and every man still has that right reserved in all these forms of city improvements. For that reason, gentlemen, we can at least go this far. As has been said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD], I repeat it is a conservative step toward making the property owner pay a part of the improvements. I would go as far as the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] does. I would make the property owner pay it all; but I agree that we ought now to adopt the principle of making property owners here pay a portion of the cost of the improvements opposite their property, and do it according to the established machinery of law which is now in operation in the District.

I call for the vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the word "levied" where it appears after the word "assessments," in the first line of the last paragraph, and inserting the word "levied" before the word "payable," in the same line.

Also add to the amendment the following:

"Provided further, That if upon any hearing of objections to the proposed assessment by any property owner affected the commissioners shall determine that the special benefits accruing to the property proposed to be assessed are not equal to the proposed assessment, then and in such case the commissioners shall determine the amount of such special benefits, if any, and such amount only shall be assessed against such property."

Mr. BORLAND. These are separate amendments, and I demand a division of them.

Mr. LENROOT. I suggest to the gentleman that while they are separate they should be treated together.

Mr. BORLAND. I have no objection to the first one.

Mr. LENROOT. The first one ought not to go in unless the last one is adopted.

Mr. BORLAND. I demand a division of those amendments, because, as I say, I am not opposed to the first one, that it shall be levied as well as collected under the rule applying to sidewalks; but I am opposed to the second amendment, which gives the commissioners some sort of arbitrary discretion to discriminate against certain property owners as to how much shall be paid.

Mr. SISSON. That is now the law.

Mr. BURLESON. That is now the law, absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed, and everything is proceeding now by unanimous consent.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes in which to make a statement concerning my amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Reserving the right to object, I should like to have two minutes in which to reply.

Mr. BURLESON. Very well; but I serve notice that I am going to object to any further extensions to anybody.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]?

There was no objection.

Mr. LENROOT. Merely in the interest of the gentleman's own amendment I wish to state that he does not want this first amendment adopted unless the second one is adopted, because the first amendment will require the commission to give the notice under the law of 1894, and the gentleman does not want that notice given unless there is some discretion to be reposed in the commission, as under the law of 1894, but which is not proposed in the gentleman's amendment. So the two practically go together and ought to stand or fall together.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is not quite correct about that. The notice is not intended to cover the cost of the apportionment of the assessment. The notice is not intended to cover the desirability of the improvement at all, and that notice is perfectly feasible under this law as it is under the sidewalk law. I have no objection to the first amendment.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks for a division of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, and the question is on the adoption of the first part of the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LENROOT] there were 8 ayes and 45 noes.

So the amendment to the amendment was lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the second part of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin in the nature of a proviso.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it an amendment to the pending amendment?

Mr. CALDER. It is.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CULLOP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Curtiss, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions (S. Res. 445):

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. GEORGE S. LEGARE, late a Representative from the State of South Carolina.

Resolved, That a committee of nine Senators be appointed by the President of the Senate pro tempore, to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to attend the funeral of the deceased, at Charleston, S. C.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

And that in compliance with the foregoing the President of the Senate pro tempore had appointed as said committee Mr. TILLMAN, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. PERKY, Mr. MYERS, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. CRAWFORD, and Mr. POINDEXTER.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment, in the first paragraph, by striking out the words "or by resurfacing and existing pavement."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purpose of investigating and reporting upon the collection and disposal of garbage and other city waste originating in the District of Columbia, including the preparation of plans and specifications for the construction of plants, the necessary accessories, and the employment of personal services and such other incidental expenses as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this appropriation, to be immediately available, $10,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the paragraph. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if it is contemplated by this provision in the bill to take that portion of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad right of way which was abandoned by virtue of a law passed February 12, 1901, whereby this roadway become the property of the United States and subsequently was completed by a deed thereto. I ask if it is intended by this paragraph to take that as the site for the proposed building?

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I have no idea as to where it is intended to locate the proposed garbage plant. I ask unanimous consent that this item be passed, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] requested to have it passed if he was not present at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that this paragraph may be passed over with the point of order pending. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] that the item on page 39 of the bill is probably the one that he refers to, instead of this one on page 33.

The Clerk read as follows:

Bathing beach: For superintendent, $600; watchman, $480; temporary services, supplies, and maintenance, $2,250; for repairs to buildings, pools, and the upkeep of the grounds, $1,500, to be immediately available; in all, $4,830.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph for the reason that it is not authorized by existing law.

Mr. BURLESON. The gentleman refers to the words making it immediately available?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; I refer to the bathing-beach proposition.

Mr. BURLESON. There is a statute which authorizes it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will read the statute to the gentleman if he wishes to hear it. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and permitted to construct a beach and dressing houses upon the east shore of the tidal reservoir against the Washington Monument grounds, and to maintain the same for the purpose of free public bathing, under such regulations as they shall deem to be for the public welfare; and the Secretary of War is requested to permit such use of the public domain as may be required to accomplish the objects above set forth.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $3,000 is hereby appropriated, from the revenues of the District of Columbia, to be immediately available for the purposes of this act.

Approved, September 26, 1890. (U. S. Stat., vol. 25, p. 490.)

Now, Mr. Chairman, this carries the proposition of $2,250 for repairs and another item of $1,500 for upkeep, payable half and half. It is quite clear from the act that I have just read that it was originally a District proposition.

Mr. BURLESON. I will state to the Chair that under the act of Congress authorizing a bathing beach it has been established, and appropriations for its maintenance and upkeep have been carried in this paragraph, I think, for some years by law. It has been carried for a number of years in the exact language that is contained in this bill except the words "immediately available." We have that right under the rules of the House, and, furthermore, it is necessary, because a number of the buildings have been injured by a storm. If the bathing beach is to be utilized during the coming summer when bathing beaches are ordinarily utilized, the money must be immediately available in order that the repairs may be effected.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky read the second section in the act of 1890 again?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is as follows:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $3,000 is hereby appropriated, from the revenues of the District of Columbia, to be immediately available for the purposes of this act.

Therefore it is quite apparent on its face, Mr. Chairman, that the money to be available for the purpose of the act was to be appropriated from the revenues of the District of Columbia, and not on the half-and-half plan.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Texas if the act of 1890 is authorization for the bathing beach, and for its maintenance, repairs, and continuance, if the Congress would not have to look to that act as its authority for its continuance and repairs, and if the original act made it chargeable only against the District revenues, if it would not be subject to a point of order upon that ground—not on the ground that $4,830 is in excess of $3,000, but considering the first paragraph of the bill in connection with the paragraph against which the point of order is made, in the light of the act of 1890, would not the Chair be obliged to sustain the point of order?

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, the bathing beach was established under that act, but there is no stipulation in it that the maintenance and upkeep shall be wholly from the revenues of the District of Columbia. It is true that was the first appropriation for the bathing beach, and it is stipulated by terms that it should be wholly from the revenues of the District of Columbia; but having established it, it is a municipal institution, and the necessary appropriation was carried in the District appropriation bill in the usual way, couched in the language of the present paragraph.

I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that in the act of 1908 $10,000 was appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. That was an appropriation act?

Mr. BURLESON. An appropriation act for the improvement of wharves and floating baths. That was one-half from the revenues of the General Government and one-half from the revenues of the District government. Consequently this is a composite institution, if such a term can be used. It has been erected partly from funds taken only from the revenues of the District of Columbia and partly from the revenues taken one-half from the District and one-half from the General Government. I will read to the Chair the language of the act of 1908. Providing for the superintending force it then says:

And for temporary service, maintenance, and repairs, $1,950; construction of bathhouses, and for improvement of the wharves and floating baths, $7,000; and the appropriation of $5,000 for this purpose for the fiscal year 1907 is hereby made available, and in addition to the $5,000 herein provided.

There are $12,000 appropriated in the act of 1908 for improvements and the construction of new buildings for the bathing beach. This is simply for the supervisory force to take care of an institution that has been erected partly out of the funds of the District of Columbia and partly out of the funds of the General Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any other act?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is the only act.

Mr. BURLESON. It is a public work in progress.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any other act, except that of 1890, and the appropriation bill from which the gentleman has just read?

Mr. BURLESON. None other than the ordinary appropriations carried from year to year since that time.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest this, that in the act of 1890 it is the first section by itself which authorizes the bathing beach. That section says nothing as to how the funds shall be paid. It simply authorizes the construction and maintenance. Consequently, of course, under the ordinary law it would be paid half and half; but it happens that we one year pay half and half and in other years, as, for instance, in the case of the playgrounds, we pay wholly by the city. That is a matter which the House can determine each year.

The CHAIRMAN. Can the House determine that each year in an appropriation bill, if the question is raised?

Mr. GILLETT. I think so. It might be a question whether it was not subject to a point of order to say that it should be paid entirely by the District. But when the work is once authorized it can certainly be paid in one year half and half. Any existing project authorized can be maintained afterwards half and half.

This original law was in two sections, one independent from the other. The first provided for the construction and maintenance of a bathing beach and then the second provided that the appropriation should be made by the District alone. I do not concede that that limits and offsets the general law that the expenses shall be always paid half and half. It simply provided that that portion of the appropriation should be paid by the District, and it seems to me, inasmuch as the bathing beach was authorized alone by a section, that it is in the discretion of the House afterwards to decide as to how it shall be paid.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, this is a public work, and it is a public work that was constructed under the following authority of law:

That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and permitted to construct a beach and dressing houses on the east shore of the tidal reservoir against the Washington Monument grounds, and to maintain the same for the purpose of free public bathing, etc.

The Chair will observe that not only is authority given for the construction of this beach, and the buildings therewith, but for the maintenance of the same. It is to be maintained, too, as the Chair will observe, as a free bathing resort under regulations which are prescribed. I wish to further call the attention of the Chair to——

The CHAIRMAN. Before proceeding, will the gentleman read the next paragraph so the Chair may have the two in connection? The Chair has not the act.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The Chair will observe that there is an authorization for the construction of this public work. Hence there is authority to appropriate for the same, because whatever is established by authority of law, may be appropriated for by Congress. In the very act pursuant to which this work was constructed there is a provision for buildings. The second and last section, is as follows:

That the sum of $3,000 is hereby appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, to be immediately available for the purposes of this act.

This section has no relation to the authority for the construction of the work. That portion of the act stands alone. So far as the appropriation of this money from a particular source is concerned it may be said that this fact does not furnish any ground for holding that thereafter, when the work has been established, these buildings may be allowed to go to ruin for lack of authority to appropriate for them under the general principle relating to the appropriations for repairs, and continuation of a public work. There are a great many rulings relating to appropriations that may be made with respect to a public work that is in progress. Permit me to call the attention of the Chair to this particular one:

An appropriation for current repairs and improvements of the Botanic Garden was held to be a continuation of a public work. (4 Hinds, sec. 3787; see also 4 Hinds, sec. 3778.)

I am informed that there was no law establishing that garden, but be that as it may, the proposition to which I direct the attention of the Chair is that an appropriation for improvements and current repairs of the Botanic Garden was held to be a continuation of a public work.

Certain buildings are called for in connection with this bathing beach. Unless in due course these buildings are repaired, this public property will fall into ruin, and become valueless for the purposes for which it was designed. Will it be contended that the general principles relating to the authority to appropriate for continuing a public work should not apply to this case, merely because the original act provided that the first appropriation should be made from the revenues of the District of Columbia? There is no inhibition in this act operating to restrain a subsequent Congress from appropriating for repairs or improvements, as these appropriations are usually made in the District of Columbia. The money in the first instance might have been given for this purpose, and the act might have provided in terms that the construction of the beach should be made with this money; but such a provision would not operate to deprive a subsequent Congress of the authority to appropriate for the continuation of the work. If the act making the first appropriation is to be construed as intending that all subsequent appropriations must be made from the District of Columbia, then it may be fairly contended that no greater amount than $3,000 may be appropriated, and that this particular sum must be regarded as the limit of cost. This beach has been appropriated for in the District bill for many years, just as other public works have been appropriated for. The interpretation sought to be given to the act is a strained and fanciful one, and I submit to the Chair that in the interpretation of this act, aid may be found in the fact that this statute has not been heretofore construed, as it is sought to be construed to-day. Why should it be considered that with reference to this small item, it was the intention of Congress to provide that it should not be appropriated for on the half and half principle? Why should this distinction be made as to this little work, and why, unless the meaning of the statute is absolutely clear, should it be so construed as to take this work out of the general rule? This construction is not the inevitable meaning of the section of the act providing that the first $3,000 should be appropriated from the revenues of the District. There may have been many reasons for this provision in the first instance, all consistent with the intent that, thereafter when the work was established, and progressing, it should be controlled by the general principles relative to appropriations for such works. The act itself shows that the first appropriation was intended to start the work at once. It was to be immediately available. The legislators may have thought that the District of Columbia ought to put the work on its feet, so to say, and therefore ought to pay the initial cost. But this is perfectly consistent with an intention to authorize Congress to appropriate for the work thereafter on the half and half principle. I repeat that to take this one appropriation, this initial appropriation from the District revenues, and argue, therefrom that thereafter all appropriations for maintenance and repair must be made exclusively from the District revenues, is to give a strained and fanciful interpretation to the act, an interpretation opposed to its manifest meaning, and at variance with the general policy relating to appropriations in the District of Columbia. For these reasons we insist that the point of order should be overruled.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman has just stated this is a public work——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Just a moment. I wish to state this is a public graft. I remained in Washington for 30 days after the adjournment of Congress, and if the often repeated statements in the newspapers are to be believed, the superintendent of that place when the doors of it were locked against the public was down there receiving people to bathe for which he received special fees. In addition to that, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GILLETT. May I ask the gentleman, how does the gentleman obtain that information? Does he know it personally?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I announced that if the statements often made in the newspapers last fall were to be believed that was true. I have heard also the commissioners had an investigation of that matter, but I do not know of my own knowledge that that is true.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not know anything about it myself, only it seems to me such a serious charge as that ought to have a more definite foundation than mere newspaper statements.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The newspapers day after day charged that to be a fact, and then the superintendent came into the public print and made his statement in regard to it.

Mr. BURLESON. Does the gentleman always accept the statements made in that newspaper?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I wish to assure him that I do not. But, Mr. Chairman, just one other thing. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] has advanced a new rule for the construction of a pavement. He says the first section stands by itself for the construction of the whole bill. Just the reverse is true. Any paper must stand in its entirety to be construed. It applies not only to a will, to a deed of conveyance, but it applies also to the act of any legislative body. That I may not be misunderstood, Mr. Chairman, my point of order in the main—and I have minor points of order against the item—is that there is nothing in this which authorizes an expenditure on the part of the Federal Government. I do not take the position that this bill does not authorize the continuance of this thing for the people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BURLESON. If the Chair will just permit an additional suggestion. Frequently provision is made for the erection or construction of public-school buildings, which provision would be subject to a point of order had it been directed against the item at the time it was originally presented. But the public-school building having been provided for and erected under that appropriation, surely no one would contend that the Government could not make provision for janitor service or repairs to the school building after it had been brought into existence. And that is exactly analogous to the present case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair entirely agrees with the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] just made with reference to public schools or playgrounds, and concedes the authority of Congress by appropriation to provide for their continuance as a public work after they have once been put into operation. But the Chair would not agree with the gentleman's position if there were a general act, or special act, originally providing for the construction and maintenance of those buildings if thereafter an appropriation were sought to be made upon terms contrary to the act of original authorization under which they were first brought into existence and maintained. In regard to this particular paragraph against which the point of order is now made, if the paragraph for a bathing beach, and so forth, had appeared in this appropriation bill prior to the passage of this act of 1890, it would have been subject to the point of order, because there was no law authorizing it, either wholly out of District revenues or by half-and-half appropriation. On September 26, 1890, however, an act was passed, the first section of which reads:

That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and permitted to construct a beach and dressing houses upon the east shore of the tidal reservoir against the Washington Monument Grounds, and to maintain the same for the purpose of free public bathing, under such regulations as they shall deem to be for the public welfare; and the Secretary of War is requested to permit such use of the public domain as may be required to accomplish the objects above set forth.

The second section is as follows:

That the sum of $3,000 is hereby appropriated from the revenues of the District of Columbia, to be immediately available, for the purposes of this act.

It is of course assumed that the $3,000 was expended for the purposes of this act as provided in section 1. The purposes of the act as set out in section 1 are "to construct a beach and dressing houses," and so forth, and "to maintain the same." Then, if any subsequent appropriation is sought to be made for the maintenance, repair, and continuance of this public work, why not follow the act in pursuance of which the first appropriation was made? Why discard the special act of Congress passed for this specific purpose and rely upon an implied authority, derived from another law of prior existence?

In the view of the existing statute on the subject, the entire act being, according to familiar rule, construed together, a judicial officer would be required under rules of law to look to the intention of the legislation and to the intention, if necessary to be resorted to, of the legislators at the time the act was passed. It seems to the Chair that if it was intended by Congress at the time of passing the act of 1890 that the construction and maintenance of the bathing beach would be chargeable to the District of Columbia for one year only, and that thereafter the maintenance and repair of the bathing beach would be chargeable and appropriated for under the half-and-half clause, then Congress would undoubtedly have said so in the act, either by express provision to that effect or by words of limitation. There is no ambiguity in the language contained in the act of 1890; there is no conflict or want of harmony between the two sections; the last is the logical sequence to the first, and it fixes the expense of the enterprise wholly on the District. This being true, as is apparent from a clear reading of the act itself, the Chair is forced to the legal conclusion, giving to words their usual and ordinary meaning and significance, that the bathing beach, as authorized and appropriated for by the act, was to be for free public bathing in the District of Columbia, to be constructed and maintained wholly from the revenues of the District. At any rate, that is what the law which brought the beach into existence says. In that view of the case, the Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the construction, by contract or otherwise, of an underground drain from the fountain lying south of the White House, across the grounds of the White House (reservation No. 1) and of the Washington Monument (reservation No. 2) to the bathing beach near Seventeenth and B Streets NW., $2,500; and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to enter said reservations for the purpose of installing said drain.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph as being new legislation.

Mr. BURLESON. The bathing pools are gone now, and, of course, we do not want the water. I concede that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The commissioners shall submit for the consideration of Congress, in the annual estimates for the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1915, detailed estimates for the construction of not exceeding two public bathing beaches, with all necessary buildings, on separate sites other than that now used and where tidal water shall be constantly available for bathing purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph, because it is legislation.

Mr. BURLESON. It is conceded, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is conceded and sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries: Clerk (stenographer and typewriter), $900; supervisor, $2,500; to be employed not exceeding 10 months, as follows—13 directors of playgrounds or recreation centers at $65 per month each, assistant director at $60 per month; to be employed not exceeding 7 months, as follows—2 assistant directors at $60 per month each, assistant director at $50 per month; to be employed not exceeding 3 months, as follows—1 assistant director at $60 per month, 13 assistants at $45 per month each; watchmen, to be employed not exceeding 12 months, as follows—10 at $45 per month each, one at $25 per month; in all, $21,275.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, last year's bill, I think, provided for——

Mr. FOWLER. I reserve a point of order against the paragraph, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FOSTER (continuing). The salary of the superintendent for 10 months at $175 per month. This year I see $2,500 is recommended.

Mr. BURLESON. We made provision last year for only certain months of the year.

Mr. FOSTER. Ten months.

Mr. BURLESON. And they now want it for 12 months, the entire year, and they have increased his salary proportionately.

I will call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] to the fact that all of these funds are to be paid wholly from the revenues of the District of Columbia, and that was really one of the terms of the compromise—that if they would assent to the proposition that these expenses were to be taken only from the treasury of the District of Columbia, we would be liberal with them in making provision for the playgrounds.

And whereas we have not ceased to scrutinize these items, yet we have been inclined to be liberal with them in this matter, inasmuch as the money is to come wholly from the revenues of the District of Columbia, and these various changes that are suggested in this item were earnestly urged by those in charge of the playgrounds.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] further that the superintendent of the playgrounds, or whatever his title may be——

Mr. FOSTER. Supervisor of the playgrounds——

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes. Was brought here under what amounts to a moral promise to receive this salary. He left a larger salary at the place he came from.

Mr. COX. Where did he come from?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I do not know, but his last employment was in my city. I never knew him and had not met him before he came to Washington, but I understand he received a larger salary there, and we thought we were under a sort of moral obligation to see to it that the promise made to him was fulfilled.

Mr. FOSTER. That is no authority.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. I know; but that is one of the considerations that influenced the committee in reporting this salary—that he had been led to expect a compensation equal to that which he received before he came here. I do not represent him, and have no authority to speak for him.

Mr. FOSTER. Did the District Commissioners recommend that this be done?

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Yes. The District Commissioners put it in the estimates, and we were liberal because, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] has said, the payment comes entirely out of the District revenues.

Mr. FOSTER. Still I do not think Congress ought to let certain people control this matter, and only a few of them who have to say anything about it. It comes off the taxpayers.

Mr. BURLESON. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that we would not permit any unreasonable charge. We have not omitted our supervision of the matter. We still have it under scrutiny; but, as I say, we have been more liberal by reason of the fact that the entire burden of this service must be borne by the District taxpayers.

Mr. FOSTER. And it is the gentleman's opinion that after an investigation of this subject the matter ought to stand as it is?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes. We regard them as reasonable and just charges.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] reserved a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, under the explanation of the chairman of the committee that the amount is to be paid wholly out of the funds of the District of Columbia, I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] withdraws his point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter, all railroads using engines propelled by steam shall pay to the District of Columbia for the lighting, under the direction and control of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, of the public roads, streets, avenues, and alleys, for their full width, through which their tracks may be laid, for the length of the street occupied by the said tracks, whether the said tracks be laid above, below, or at grade; as well as for the lighting of the subways and bridges over or under which the tracks of said railroads pass; and in default of payment of such bills actions at law may be maintained by the District of Columbia against said railroads or their successors, transferees, or lessees therefor: Provided, That nothing herein shall be held to repeal the act of May 26, 1908, relating to the Washington Terminal Co.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire of those who have the bill in charge whether it would not be better, instead of saying "all railroads using engines propelled by steam," to say "all railroads other than street railroads," or something like that. The distinction has been made all along in the District of Columbia between street railroads and the other kind of railroads by designating the latter as railroads using engines propelled by steam. It may be that at no very distant day all those railroads upon entering the District of Columbia will use electricity to propel them, particularly through the tunnel down here.

Mr. SAUNDERS. So far as I am personally concerned, I am willing to accept the amendment. The chairman of the subcommittee is absent at this moment, and I suggest that we pass it without prejudice, to be returned to later.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman make that request?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I ask unanimous consent that this section be passed without prejudice, to be returned to on motion hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the pending paragraph be passed without prejudice, with the right to recur to it hereafter. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the erection of a brick or concrete storehouse and wall on land belonging to the District of Columbia, or on the portion of the old right of way of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad through square 857, which the commissioners are hereby authorized to use as a site for this storehouse and for any other municipal use they may deem necessary, including the grading and improving of the ground, $7,500.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that paragraph. It is entirely new legislation, without any authorization.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, this item is subject to a point of order, but it will save the District, as well as the General Government, considerable expense if the warehouse is erected. They are now paying rather an exorbitant sum for rent of buildings to protect the materials and supplies of the electrical department. By the construction of a building costing $7,500 this rent could be saved. But I admit that this is new legislation, and subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE. I insist on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is insisted on by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. LITTLEPAGE]. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, just a moment ago the paragraph on page 38, begining with line 5, was passed by unanimous consent, to be recurred to at any time. I ask that that be done now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to recur to page 38, beginning at line 5, for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. SAUNDERS. The amendment is proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]. It is that the words "using engines propelled by steam" be stricken out, and the words "other than street railroads" be inserted in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 38, lines 5 and 6, by striking out the words "using engines propelled by steam," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "other than street railroads."

Mr. SAUNDERS. So far as the committee are concerned they accept that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For completing the purchase, installation, and maintenance of water meters to be placed on the water services of the National Museum, Washington Aqueduct, Naval Hospital, Naval Medical School, Library of Congress, and Hygienic Laboratory Buildings and for each and every purpose connected therewith, said meters to be purchased, installed, and maintained by and remain under the observation of the officer in charge of the Washington Aqueduct, $4,700.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to make the point of order, I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON], who is in charge of the bill, as to whether or not these are items similar to the ones to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made a point of order last year.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] did make the point of order, as I remember it, but he withdrew the point of order upon the statement made that the purpose was to detect waste of water.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. To determine the capacity of the plant.

Mr. BURLESON. To detect the wastage of water occasioned by leakage.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I decline to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend some remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech delivered by the Hon. AUGUSTUS O. STANLEY, of Kentucky, on the subject of injunctions and the subject of Robert E. Lee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend some remarks in the RECORD by inserting the addresses referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if these speeches will come at the end of the RECORD instead of in the midst of the proceedings?

Mr. HEFLIN. They will come at the end of the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Heads of departments in high and manual training high schools in group B of class 6, 12 in all, at a minimum salary of $1,900 each.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman a question. I observe that in the language of this bill it provides always for the minimum salary of the teachers. For instance, the paragraph just read says:

Heads of departments in high and manual training high schools in group B of Class 6, 12 in all, at a minimum salary of $1,900 each.

Mr. BURLESON. That is the basic pay; the salary is increased from year to year, and the longevity pay is carried in a separate paragraph.

Mr. CULLOP. I observe in the report on page 4, that seven teachers' salaries have been increased from $1,000 to $1,000 a year.

Mr. BURLESON. That is true.

Mr. CULLOP. Are those the only increases that are made?

Mr. BURLESON. No; but all of the teachers, I think, receive a certain increase of salary each year as the result of their length of service. That increase continues for a fixed period.

Mr. CULLOP. That is the automatic increase provided for some years ago.

Mr. BURLESON. This particular increase resulted from an item carried in the last year's appropriation bill, embodied in that bill at the other end of the Capitol. There were certain teachers who had been, under the provisions of law, denied longevity increase, and so that particular paragraph was put in the bill. This increase is the accumulated longevity pay to which they were entitled.

Mr. CULLOP. And which had been denied them under the operation of law?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I want it understood that I am not opposed to any increase in teachers' salaries. In my opinion, they are engaged in the most important service that there is connected with our civilization.

Mr. BURLESON. The gentleman is speaking generally and not particularly with reference to the school-teachers of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CULLOP. I am speaking of the school-teachers generally.

Mr. BURLESON. I am glad of that.

Mr. CULLOP. I think they perform the most important service of any employees we have in the Nation. I have long since believed that as a general rule all over the country school-teachers ought to be paid more liberally than they are because of the valuable and important service that they render to the public.

Mr. Chairman, the school-teachers in our public schools, I desire to take this occasion to say, are entitled to the highest consideration for their unselfish efforts in behalf of humanity. They perform a service for which we all owe them a debt of lasting gratitude, and wherever I can promote their welfare I feel it my duty to do so.

Upon them rests a great responsibility, and every reasonable encouragement should be given them in order to show our full appreciation for their great and good work. Intrusted to their care and keeping in a great measure is the future of the country and the hope of the Republic. The public schools are the people's colleges, and in these the young of this generation are trained for the responsibilities of succeeding generations, and as they perform their services the result will bear its fruit when the opportunities are presented. To them is committed for education the children of our land. They train the head, heart, and body, and the character of the future men and women is being formed and molded in a great degree by them; hence our consideration for their service. In their great work we should lend encouragement and stimulate their efforts for the highest standard, in order that it should be well performed; and therefore it should be well remunerated, that the best results may be obtained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Longevity pay: Longevity pay for director of intermediate instruction, supervising principal, supervisor of manual training, principals of the normal, high, and manual training high schools, principals of the grade manual training schools, heads of departments, director and assistant director of primary instruction, directors and assistant directors of drawing, physical culture, music, domestic science, domestic art, and kindergartens, teachers, clerks, librarians and clerks, and librarians to be paid in strict conformity with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to fix and regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia," approved June 20, 1906, as amended by the acts approved May 26, 1908, May 18, 1910, and June 26, 1912, $375,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to make a point of order, I wish to inquire of the gentleman the reason of inserting the word "high," on page 43, line 18.

Mr. BURLESON. That is to make it more specific and clear. My recollection is that under the terms of the amendment referred to a moment ago these teachers were in the high school.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, it refers to manual-training school teachers, and in order that there shall be no mistake, there being grade manual-training schools and high manual-training schools, the word "high" was inserted.

Mr. BURLESON. It is a word of limitation rather than enlargement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I do not make the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

J. Ormond Wilson Normal School and Ross School, engineer, $900; janitor, $600; laborer, $420; 3 laborers, at $360 each; in all, $3,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAY). Does the gentleman reserve it or make it?

Mr. FOWLER. I reserve it. For the J. Ormond Wilson Normal School and the Ross School provision is made for an engineer, at $900. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if that is a new position created in the department, a new engineer?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; this is a new building just completed, and we are supplying the force.

Mr. FOWLER. Do they need an engineer there all the time?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly they do. It is a building that is intended to house several hundred students, and very much larger than the library, about which the gentleman was talking yesterday.

Mr. FOWLER. If it is necessary, I do not want to cut it out at all.

Mr. BURLESON. It is necessary.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Eastern High School, janitor, $900; laborer, $420; laborer $360; in all, $1,680.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman why it is that in the Eastern High School no provision is made for an engineer, whereas in the paragraph on page 45, to which I called your attention a moment ago, there is an engineer provided for?

Mr. BURLESON. The Eastern High School has a janitor. It is a very much smaller building.

Mr. FOWLER. Are there not three buildings together in that Eastern High School?

Mr. BURLESON. We did not allow them an engineer because they did not ask for it and did not make it plain that one was needed. If they had asked for it and made it plain to us that one was needed, we would have allowed it. The fact that one is not there is because they did not make it plain that one was needed.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I accept the gentleman's explanation.

The Clerk read as follows:

McKinley Manual Training School, janitor, $900; engineer and instructor in steam engineering, $1,500; assistant engineer, $1,000; 2 assistant janitors, at $720 each; fireman, $420; 2 laborers, at $360 each; in all, $5,980.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order. I desire to ask the gentleman why the salary of the engineer is increased from $1,200 to $1,500?

Mr. BURLESON. Because the District Commissioners estimated for the increase and urgently insisted upon it, and because the president of one of the labor organizations appeared before the committee and directed our attention to the fact that the engineers and employees of the District school service were underpaid. They convinced us that there ought to be a slight increase in the salary, and for that reason we granted it.

Mr. FOWLER. Why did you not increase the salary of the two laborers from $360 to something like $400 or $500?

Mr. BURLESON. Because we thought the service they were rendering was not worth that amount of money.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the Committee on the District of Columbia in the course of investigations held found that the pay for many of the engineers and janitors was so small that competent service could not be obtained, and that because of that fact many of the engines and furnaces were being destroyed. The Committee on the District of Columbia believes it would be a matter of economy to increase the salaries of some of them rather than to leave valuable machinery and boilers in the hands of alleged incompetent men.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, was it not the duty of the Committee on the District of Columbia to report a bill increasing these salaries rather than to leave it to the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not know whether the gentleman would call it duty. That recommendation has been filed by the committee.

Mr. GARNER. Under the rules of the House, is it not impossible for the Committee on Appropriations to increase the salaries if a point of order be made?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. My opinion is that this is subject to a point of order.

Mr. GARNER. Being subject to a point of order and being legislation that is desirable, it occurs to me that it is the duty of the Committee on the District of Columbia to bring in this legislation and make it absolutely so the will of the House can be carried out.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from Texas fails to appreciate, I am sure, the extent of the work that the District of Columbia Committee has had upon its hands, quite recently in any event.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I see in the next paragraph, providing for the Armstrong Manual Training School, there is an increase of salary of the engineer from $1,000 to $1,200. Why was not his salary made $1,500, the same as it was in the McKinley Manual Training School?

Mr. BURLESON. Because we thought it was adequate compensation for the service that particular engineer was rendering. The measure of responsibility was less.

Mr. FOWLER. There are some assistant engineers there, and their salaries have been increased from $720 to $1,000.

Mr. BURLESON. We did it for the same reason I have just stated to the gentleman. They are all subject to the point of order. I will call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that they are all subject to a point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. I felt I knew that, but I was trying to see whether I ought to make the point of order or not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman reserve that for a moment, until I ask a question of the gentleman from Texas?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois reserve the point of order?

Mr. FOWLER. I will reserve the point of order for a moment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman from Texas say that the representatives of the labor organizations were in favor of the increase of this salary?

Mr. BURLESON. That was not the reason that moved the committee to grant the increase. The District Commissioners estimated for this increase. They earnestly urged that it be granted and gave the reasons therefor. Subsequently a representative of the labor organizations asked to come before the committee. We granted him permission, and he made full explanation of the salaries received by engineers connected with the school service compared with the wages received by persons engaged in similar services in private employment, and we reached the conclusion that it was only just and fair that this increase should be granted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was apparent to the committee that it was the wish of the labor organizations that the increase in this particular instance should be granted?

Mr. BURLESON. Undoubtedly. The representative of the labor organization was very earnest in his insistence that the increase be granted, stating it was inadequate compensation for the services rendered, and the committee was impressed with the justice of his contention and unanimously granted the increase.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It seems to be in conformity with the union rules in the District in regard to wages paid for this kind of work?

Mr. BURLESON. We did not go into that, being governed entirely by the representation that this was inadequate compensation for the services which were being rendered.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask the indulgence of the gentleman from Illinois for just one more question. I would like the gentleman from Texas to say whether or not this engineer and instructor in steam engineering renders services both as an engineer in the management of the building and also as an instructor in steam engineering to the students of the school?

Mr. BURLESON. That is true.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So he acts in a dual capacity?

Mr. BURLESON. He acts in a dual capacity.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the committee, of course, was unable to pay him two salaries, and, Solomon-like, differentiate between the engineer who does the actual work in the school building, and the instructor in steam engineering who instructs the scholars—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his point of order in this instance, as it seems to me to be a most meritorious case.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the same work which is done in the McKinley Manual Training School is done in the Armstrong Manual Training School—that is, he is both engineer and instructor in engineering; but if I could get an understanding that they both will be placed upon the same plane, that you will not object to an amendment I shall offer to increase the salary of the engineer of the Armstrong Manual Training School, I have no disposition to interpose a point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not apparent to the gentleman that the committee was confronted with a great difficulty in solving this question? Here was an employee occupying a dual position, an engineer in charge of the engineering features of the building, charged with the preservation of the property and the safety of the machinery. That was one job——

Mr. FOWLER. It is the same in the Armstrong Manual Training School.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He is certainly worth $750 for that, and that would have been only one-half of his employment. Then he is employed as instructor of steam engineering, training the young idea how to shoot. That is worth $750 more.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman fails to understand my contention.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I submit to the gentleman that this is a meritorious case, and he ought not to press his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to say if the gentleman will not agree to allow an increase in the salaries in the Armstrong Manual Training School——

Mr. BURLESON. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that when we reach the item I will explain it to his complete satisfaction as to why the change is made in the salaries.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, upon the guaranty of the gentleman I will withdraw the point of order. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Armstrong Manual Training School, janitor, $900; assistant janitor, $720; engineer and instructor in steam engineering, $1,200; assistant engineer, $720; 2 laborers, at $360 each; in all, $4,260.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against this paragraph, and desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill why it is that he did not increase the assistant engineer's salary in this school from $720, to $1,000, the same as was done in the McKinley Manual Training School, the same character of work being performed by these assistant engineers in each of the schools?

Mr. BURLESON. Because the conditions are entirely different. The McKinley Manual Training School is a white school. The attendance is twice the attendance of the Armstrong Manual Training School, which is a negro school. In the McKinley School a very large percentage of the pupils are males, and the duties devolving upon this engineer as an instructor are very much greater than the duties devolving upon the engineer at the Armstrong Manual Training School, where a large percentage of the pupils are females. Inasmuch as these schools are very different in size, not only as to the buildings but in the number of pupils attending them, and because of the fact that the duties of the engineer at the McKinley Manual Training School are more onerous and responsible than the duties imposed upon the engineer at the Armstrong Manual Training School, we felt constrained to make this difference in their salaries.

Mr. FOWLER. Why, then, did you make an increase at all?

Mr. BURLESON. Because we did not want to be put in the attitude of discrimination, even if the service was not exactly as important. We went beyond the recommendation of the school board in the case of the Armstrong Manual Training School.

Mr. FOWLER. Did they recommend any increase in the salary of the engineer?

Mr. BURLESON. They did not. But we thought it was only fair, so long as we were increasing the salaries of these other engineers—although the cases were entirely different, although there was no estimate in their behalf, and no labor organization appearing in their interest—we did not propose to discriminate against them.

Mr. FOWLER. Is that engineer a colored man?

Mr. BURLESON. He is.

Mr. FOWLER. Why not increase his salary the same as you do that of the engineer in the McKinley Training School?

Mr. BURLESON. We did more for him than we did for the white man.

Mr. FOWLER. You have increased his salary $200, whereas you increased the salary of the McKinley Manual Training School engineer $300.

Mr. BURLESON. There was an urgent insistence that the salary of the engineer of the McKinley Training School be increased for the reasons I have given. There was no recommendation for an increase of the salary of the engineer in the Armstrong School.

Mr. FOWLER. He does exactly the same work in this school that the engineer does in the McKinley Manual Training School.

Mr. BURLESON. The point we make is that it is not the same kind of work.

Mr. FOWLER. He is both an engineer and a teacher of engineering.

Mr. BURLESON. That may all be.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there any difference in the size of these schools?

Mr. BURLESON. I have just stated to the gentleman that the McKinley Manual Training School is twice as large as the Armstrong Manual Training School.

Mr. FOWLER. You did in a way.

Mr. BURLESON. I did say in express terms that the McKinley Manual Training School is more than twice as large as the other.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. And the work of the engineer at the McKinley Manual Training School is very much heavier and very much more important than that of the engineer at the Armstrong Manual Training School, and the salaries are very equitable. In fact, the colored engineer, at $1,200, is very much better paid, in my judgment, than is the white engineer at the other school, at $1,500.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my point of order and——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] withdraws his point of order.

Mr. FOWLER (continuing). And move to strike out the words "$1,200," in line 14, page 26, and insert in lieu thereof the words "$1,300."

Mr. BURLESON. To which amendment I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 14, page 26, by striking out "$1,200" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,300."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] make a point of order against the amendment?

Mr. BURLESON. I made a full statement about this matter. I will withdraw my point of order, Mr. Chairman, and let the House pass upon the proposition.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. TAYLOR of Ohio. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] has withdrawn it.

Mr. FOWLER. An increase having once been made and carried in the bill permits an amendment under the rules of the House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will be very glad to see this amendment carried for many reasons. I would not have a bill passed here discriminating against a man because of his color for any consideration.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. That every man stands upon an equality before the law in America must be conceded by all. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. BLACKMON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois if the fact were shown to him that the white man was doing twice as much work as the negro, would he want to give the same salary to the negro as to the white man?

Mr. FOWLER. If the labor differs in character and quantity sufficiently to justify a discrimination were both laborers white men, then I would make a discrimination if one were a white man and the other a colored man.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. But, Mr. Chairman, unless there is such a difference in the work to be performed in these institutions that it can be said upon principles of equity that a distinction ought to be made, then I am not in favor of making such distinction.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes. I have only five minutes. I will yield for a question only.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know whether the union rules with regard to the wage scale obtain in this case as in the other?

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, I suppose the wage scale has nothing to do with this case at all, and it ought not to have anything to do with the other case. In other words, Congress, in passing upon the question of an adequate wage, ought to do its duty upon the basis of right, and not upon any other consideration.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am speaking of the union-labor question now. Where a wage scale is fixed for this kind of work the highest and best scale ought to be paid. Is the gentleman arguing that in this particular instance labor organizations are interested, or is he arguing——

Mr. FOWLER. I can not say, Mr. Chairman, whether labor organizations have had anything to say concerning this question or not, but the highest scale ought to be paid where a wage scale has been agreed upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire an extension of time for three minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks that the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] objects.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, just a word in reply. I want to assure the committee that there has been absolutely no discrimination in practice in this case. If there was any discrimination, it was in behalf of the engineer at the Armstrong Manual Training School. He did not ask for the increase himself. The District Commissioners did not ask it for him. The labor organizations did not ask that his salary be increased. But when we took into consideration the other institutions, we discriminated in his favor by granting him an increase when we were really probably not justified in granting the increase, and I ask the committee to vote down the amendment.

Mr. DYER. I want to ask the gentleman if the question of color had anything to do with it?

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, absolutely nothing. The facts are just as I have stated them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question there? Does he know whether in this particular instance the engineer happens to be a member of a labor organization? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] was indicating that he spoke very largely as a representative of the workingmen, and there is a question as to whether the colored brother is a member of any labor union in this District.

Mr. BURLESON. I think they are not permitted to be members of labor unions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. FOWLER. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 2, noes 17.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to carry into effect the withdrawal of the point of order by the gentleman from Illinois if he can find a parliamentary way in which to do it; but the gentleman from Texas moved that the committee rise, and the motion has been agreed to and the result announced.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RODDENBERY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 28499) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE AT SUNDAY SESSION.

The SPEAKER designated Mr. LINTHICUM to act as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House to-morrow, Sunday, February 2.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's table Senate concurrent resolution 35, and consider the same.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the two Houses of Congress shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 12th day of February, 1913, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, pursuant to the requirements of the Constitution and laws relating to the election of President and Vice President of the United States, and the President of the Senate pro tempore shall be their presiding officer; that two tellers shall be previously appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate pro tempore, all the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes, which certificates and papers shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the letter A; and said tellers, having then read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been ascertained and counted in the manner and according to the rules by law provided, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate pro tempore, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons, if any, elected President and Vice President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate resolution.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, before the question is taken I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the resolution if it is in the usual form?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. It is a verbatim copy of the resolution passed four years ago.

The resolution was concurred in; and the Speaker appointed Mr. RUCKER of Missouri and Mr. YOUNG of Michigan as tellers.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of House Document No. 1316, and the same was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Sunday, February 2, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on advisability of providing for the west breakwater at Kahului Harbor, Hawaii (H. Doc. No. 1330); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of preliminary examination and survey of Bayou Teche, La., with view to securing increased depth (H. Doc. No. 1329); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

3. A letter from the president of the City & Suburban Railway Co. of Washington, transmitting annual report of said company for the year ending December 31, 1912 (S. Doc. No. 1049); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the president of the Potomac Electric Power Co., transmitting annual report of said company for the year ending December 31, 1912 (S. Doc. No. 1053); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the president of the Brightwood Railway Co., transmitting annual report of said company for the year ending December 31, 1912 (S. Doc. No. 1050); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the president of the Washington Railway & Electric Co., transmitting annual report of said company for the year ending December 31, 1912 (S. Doc. No. 1047); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

7. A letter from the president of the Georgetown & Tennallytown Railway Co., transmitting annual report of said company for the year ending December 31, 1912 (S. Doc. No. 1051); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

8. A letter from the president of the Anacostia & Potomac River Railroad Co., transmitting annual report of said company for the year ending December 31, 1912 (S. Doc. No. 1048); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

9. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, for the information of Congress, detailed statement of the refunds of customs duties, etc., for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1912 (H. Doc. No. 1325); to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department and ordered to be printed.

10. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, for the consideration of Congress, an amended estimate of appropriation submitted by the acting chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the year 1914 (H. Doc. No. 1326); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

11. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor submitting an amendment to the estimate of appropriation for printing and binding for the Department of Commerce and Labor for the year 1914 (H. Doc. No. 1327); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

12. A letter from the chairman of the executive committee of the Washington Interurban Railway Co., transmitting the annual report of said company for the year ending December 31, 1912 (H. Doc. No. 1328); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

13. A letter from the Acting Secretary of State, transmitting, pursuant to law, an authentic copy of the certificate of the final ascertainment of electors for President and Vice President appointed in the State of South Carolina at the election held therein on the 5th day of November, 1912; to the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress.

14. A letter from the president of the Georgetown Gas Light Co., transmitting annual report of said company for the year ending December 31, 1912 (H. Doc. No. 1324); to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. FIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 7415) granting to the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. a right of way through the Fort Wingate Military Reservation in New Mexico, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1429), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DENT, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 5378) releasing the claim of the United States Government to that portion of land, being a fractional block, bounded on the north and east by Bayou Cadet, on the west by Cevallos Street, and on the south by Intendencia Street, in the old city of Pensacola, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1431), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 5377) releasing the claim of the United States Government to lot No. 306 in the old city of Pensacola, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1432), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. NYE: A bill (H. R. 28571) to authorize the Northern Pacific Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in Minneapolis, Minn.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. EDWARDS: A bill (H. R. 28572) officially naming the War between the States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CLAYTON: A bill (H. R. 28573) to amend section 32 of an act approved March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. THOMAS: A bill (H. R. 28574) to provide for the erection of a monument to Lester Bryant; to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. COOPER: A bill (H. R. 28575) to provide a commission to secure plans and designs for a bridge as a memorial of peace and union, to be known as the Grant-Lee Bridge, and to be constructed across the Potomac River from a point in the city of Washington near the site selected by law for a memorial to Abraham Lincoln to the national cemetery at Arlington, in the State of Virginia; to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. ADAMSON: A bill (H. R. 28576) to promote the efficiency of the Public Health Service; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. CARTER: A bill (H. R. 28577) to authorize the enlargement of the Federal building site at Ardmore, Okla.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 28578) to increase the limit of cost of the Federal building at McAlester, Okla.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. LINTHICUM: A bill (H. R. 28579) to provide uniform regulations for boats engaged in the towing service; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. CRAVENS: Resolution (H. Res. 805) providing for two additional clerks to the Committee on Enrolled Bills; to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. AKIN of New York: Resolution (H. Res. 806) for reform in the civil service; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. CARTER: A memorial from the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma, asking for the appointment of a committee to investigate rural-credit systems in foreign countries to the end that such systems be established in the United States; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Also, a memorial from the State of Oklahoma, praying for correction of boundary line between the Fort Sill Military Reservation and the State of Oklahoma; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CALDER: A bill (H. R. 28580) for the relief of Alexander H. Allan and others; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CARLIN: A bill (H. R. 28581) for the relief of William S. Shacklette; to the Committee on Claims.

Also (by request), a bill (H. R. 28582) for the relief of Bella Crounse and other heirs of the estate of James Bell, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CARY: A bill (H. R. 28583) for the relief of Patrick Powers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 28584) for the relief of Leonard Seis; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia: A bill (H. R. 28585) for the relief of James H. McGill; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 28586) for the relief of the heirs of Elijah M. Hart; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. DIXON of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 28587) granting an increase of pension to Allen Hartwell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DYER: A bill (H. R. 28588) granting a pension to Margaret Cassidy; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FERGUSSON: A bill (H. R. 28589) granting an increase of pension to Augustin Prada; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 28590) granting a pension to Olive H. Glines; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 28591) granting an increase of pension to Catherine L. Dow; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 28592) granting an increase of pension to Alexander Barclay; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, February 2, 1913.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by Mr. LINTHICUM as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our God and our Father, whose presence pervades all space with rays divine, humbly, reverently we wait on Thy blessing. Open Thou our spiritual eyes, that we may see the glories round about us; our spiritual ears, that we may hear "the rustle of wings," the song of angels; our spiritual hearts, that we may feel the warm currents of Thy love and be reassured in our longings, hopes, and aspirations. Time and space are nothing, life in Thee alone is life, so we believe, so we aspire, so we pray. Our coming together to-day in memory of a great man is the earnest of that immortality which springs spontaneously from the soul and lifts us to the realms of high heaven, source of all good. His deeds speak more eloquently than tongue or pen of his worth to State and Nation. It is well thus to commemorate them, that he may live again in those who shall come after him.

Comfort those who knew and loved him, his bereaved wife and family, in the undying hope of the eternal and everlasting life in a risen and glorified Christ. For Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the Journal and that the Journal be approved. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE LATE SENATOR RAYNER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the order for to-day's session.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. LINTHICUM, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That Sunday, February 2, 1913, at 12 o'clock m., be set apart for addresses upon the life, character, and public services of Hon. ISIDOR RAYNER, late a Senator from the State of Maryland.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 807.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. ISIDOR RAYNER, late a Senator from the State of Maryland.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public career the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, my remarks upon this solemn occasion, when we meet to pay tribute to the late Senator from Maryland, Hon. ISIDOR RAYNER, shall be very brief, but I feel that I should not permit the opportunity to pass without saying something about his life, character, and public services.

In the death of Senator RAYNER, to quote from the Evening Sun of Baltimore—

Maryland has lost a man of real statesmanlike stature, of clear public vision, and of true democratic ideas.

Maryland not only loses this great man but his death is a severe blow to the Democratic Party, now about to come into control of every branch of the National Government.

My acquaintance with Senator RAYNER dates from 1876. I first met him in the presidential campaign of that year at an open-air mass meeting in Baltimore. He was then a young man, and made one of the best political speeches I ever heard. He attracted the attention of the people and the party leaders, and from that time on during the whole of his life he was always in demand as a popular and able orator.

I served with Mr. RAYNER in the Fifty-third Congress, when Mr. Cleveland was President, and he was one of the Congressmen who stood loyally by the President in his fight for the redemption of the party pledges.

He later was elected as attorney general of Maryland on the ticket with the now senior Senator from Maryland, Hon. JOHN WALTER SMITH, who was the successful candidate for governor in 1899. It is useless for me to say that he filled this high office with credit and distinction. It was not long after this that he was called upon to represent the hero of Santiago, Admiral Schley, in his defense before the court of inquiry. Mr. RAYNER'S splendid effort in this notable case will long be remembered as a masterly defense of a brave and heroic man by a great and accomplished lawyer.

Mr. RAYNER came to the Senate in 1905 to succeed the late Hon. Louis E. McComas. His campaign for the senatorship was a most vigorous and nerve-racking one. There were no less than five candidates for the office, and it was only after many caucuses, party conferences, and the keenest political maneuvering that he was chosen.

On account of his previous experience in Congress, his capacity to grasp public questions, his knowledge of public affairs, and his legal training he immediately took a most prominent part in all discussions and the workings of the legislative machinery in the Upper House.

Mr. RAYNER spent more than seven years in the Senate, and he took his place there as an orator, a debater, and a constitutional lawyer, and his career in that august body soon proved to his constituents that they had made no mistake in choosing him as their representative, for in all his actions and dealings as a public official he was always in entire sympathy with the people whom he was chosen to represent and was quick to respond to popular sentiment.

Again quoting from the Evening Sun, of Baltimore:

Above all, his instincts were true to the principles of popular government, and he intuitively turned to the side of right in nearly every great public contest. There was no shadow of turning in his democracy, and he upheld with unflinching firmness and enthusiasm the traditions and the faith of his party as handed down to him by its great political apostles.

As a member of the Judiciary Committee and the Committee on Foreign Relations he rendered most valuable service to his country and his party. He made a special study of the Constitution and international affairs, and was looked upon by both Republicans and Democrats as one of the leading authorities and most active and widely informed Senators on these great questions.

It was a great disappointment to Senator RAYNER not to be able to take part in the late campaign. The national committee and the Maryland Democratic State central committee had mapped out a most important work for him, and his inability to take up the work not only grieved him, but considerably handicapped the party leaders, and was more keenly felt as the campaign progressed.

His last public appearance was in the debate at Baltimore with the former Congressman W. Bourke Cockran, in which he acquitted himself with great credit. After this, on advice of his physicians, he was obliged to cancel all his campaign engagements and was forced to take to his bed, and five or six weeks thereafter he passed into the life everlasting.

Mr. RAYNER was known as a home man. He belonged to but one club and was only rarely found there, preferring to spend the few leisure hours which he did have in his family circle. He was a devoted husband and a loving and indulgent father, and no matter what we say or do here to-day we can not fill the wide gap that has been made in his family circle by his untimely death.

Peace and death's beauty to his heart to-day,
Who is not dead, but only gone away
To sleep a little, as a child who goes
When twilight folds the petal of the rose.

Mr. HAUGEN took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

[Mr. COVINGTON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, in offering this tribute to the memory of ISIDOR RAYNER, late a Senator from the State of Maryland, there comes to me a flood of feelings peculiarly tender.

The latter portion of Senator RAYNER'S public life was so interwoven with events with which I was intimately connected that I was in position to observe at close range this man of whom all Maryland was proud, and by reason of the nearness of my viewpoint able to analyze his motives and understand the inspiration which led him step by step into the fuller confidence of his fellow men, finally bringing him that reward which inevitably follows the faithful and intelligent discharge of a great public trust.

ISIDOR RAYNER first saw the light of day in Baltimore, April 11, 1850, the son of William S. and Amelia R. Rayner. Completing his primary education in Rippert & Newell's Academy, in Catonsville, Baltimore County, Md., he entered the University of Virginia, supplementing an academic course by one in law at the same institution, where, as a member of the Jefferson Society of the university, at the age of 18, he was chosen anniversary orator, taking as the subject of his address "Religious liberty." So well did he acquit himself in his study of the law that the examining board of the university said to him:

There is no occasion to ask you anything more. You have mastered your book so recently and well that you know more about these matters than we do.

Returning from college, he entered the law offices of Brown & Brune, in Baltimore; in 1870 was admitted to the bar, and within a comparatively short space of time won an enviable standing in his chosen profession.

It is the general testimony of those lawyers acquainted with his legal ability that he was a deep and careful student, who, within a comparatively brief period, thoroughly mastered the principles of law. His power of analysis was keen, his penetration deep, his argument sound, and invariably supported by a multitude of citations that evidenced the thoroughness with which he explored his subject. Had he devoted himself exclusively to that jealous mistress whom so many have wooed in vain, doubtless he would now be remembered as one of the far-reaching beacons of the legal profession. As it was, with his attention distracted by the endless exactions of public office, he left a reputation which hundreds may well envy whose opportunities for legal preferment far exceeded those he enjoyed.

Perhaps the greatest legal achievement of Senator RAYNER was his defense of Admiral Schley, a gallant citizen of Maryland. It was not expected the defense would mainly devolve upon Senator RAYNER, as Judge Jere M. Wilson, of Washington, was senior counsel, but Judge Wilson died soon after the court convened, and thus upon the Senator was shifted the entire burden of the case. He did not shrink from the task, although he was not an admiralty lawyer. The rapidity with which he mastered the subject, studied trigonometry, sea law and lore, gulf-stream currents, and a multitude of other intricate details, was astounding to his friends, who knew him to be the possessor of a mind likened by one of his admirers to a—mighty machine and a delicate mechanism, capable of strokes of the greatest power and at the same time of the most delicate, exquisite, and subtle touches.

When the time for argument arrived, Senator RAYNER at first spoke in agreeable and measured tones, until, becoming warmed to his subject, he struck out with powerful and convincing blows. Stripping his discussion of useless surplusage he dwelt upon the salient features of the case, and scoring the tricky memories of witnesses, lashed with Herculean vigor the traducers of the man whose fame rang around the world and whose exclamation in the height of victory, "There's glory enough for all," will go down to future generations as one of the most magnanimous expressions of the age.

As the oratorical flight of the great Marylander reached its climax, the court and the great assemblage awed, as it were, by the brilliancy of the orator and his earnestness, seemed unwilling to utter a sound, hardly to breathe, for fear that some word which fell from his lips might be lost; when instantly that the tension was relieved, there broke forth an applause such as might be likened only to a pent-up storm suddenly released. The three admirals, acting as the court, hastened to congratulate him; his friends and the assembled spectators poured praise upon him, and the brilliancy of his effort was spread broadcast throughout the United States.

Senator RAYNER's advent in politics was almost simultaneous with his entry upon the practice of his profession. In 1878 he was elected to the Maryland Legislature, where he served on the judiciary committee and was chairman of the Baltimore city delegation. In 1885 he was elected to the State senate, resigning when his term was about half finished to become the Democratic candidate for Congress. He was elected to the Fiftieth, Fifty-second, and Fifty-third Congresses and declined to receive a fourth term. Accepting the nomination for attorney general for Maryland he was elected to that office, which he held from 1899 to 1903.

I vividly recall the events connected with his first election to the United States Senate in 1904. The balloting was carried on for about a month, and the tenacity with which his friends clung to him during that long interval, despite the repeated and vigorous endeavors to sway them, convinced me that there was something unusual in a personality which could inspire such unbroken and unwavering devotion. I had the pleasure of working and voting for him and felt it almost a personal triumph when victory was finally determined for him at the night caucus of the legislature preceding the final vote of that body the next day.

Senator RAYNER stood high in the distinguished body of which he was a member. Constitutional law was the favorite field of his brilliant and versatile mind, and his masterful knowledge of the subject was expanded and enriched by contact on the floor of the Senate with contemporary students of that document, notably Senators Spooner, Bailey, and ROOT. Only a few days before his death I read in the Saturday Evening Post one of those humorous and always interesting sketches by Samuel G. Blythe, in which he poked fun in his inimitable way at the fondness of the Maryland Senator for speaking on his favorite subject. But Mr. Blythe did not say—as he would have been justified in adding—that whenever Senator RAYNER discussed the Federal Constitution the floor and galleries of the Senate always filled, and those who came invariably remained until his last word was spoken, experiencing every sensation within the art of the orator to inspire, marveling at his knowledge of the subject, fascinated with his lucidity, thrilled by his eloquence, and delighted with the deep intuition and clever reasoning which he displayed in debate.

As an example of his pleasing and graceful style in address one should read his remarks on Roosevelt's "The Charter of Democracy." Probably no words of Senator RAYNER ever were more eagerly received or widely applauded. With deferential respect for the individual whose program he was discussing, with charity toward the ignorance of law which distinguished that program, with the keenest irony and the most subtle ridicule, he demonstrated by convincing example and clever analysis the folly of subjecting to popular recall the decisions of the judiciary. Two paragraphs of that address ever will be remembered. One is typical of the gentle irony and convulsing ridicule of which he was master and which he employed so effectively; the other breathes that intense love of his country's institutions which he understood so well.

I quote them:

I never retired at night that I did not expect some political earthquake in the morning, and I never arose in the morning that I did not look for some volcanic eruption at night. I think he is a most captivating and charming person. He can talk to you by the hour upon subjects that he does not know anything about at all with the same ease and facility that he can discuss those to which he has devoted the closest study. This is a gift of Providence that none of his predecessors ever possessed. His dissertations upon the Constitution are a feast of reason and a flow of soul. The last conversation I had with him was in relation to the case of Col. Stewart, whom he had charged with certain temperamental infirmities and in whose behalf I had asked for a court of inquiry in the Senate. He informed me that being Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States he would not pay the slightest attention to any law that Congress passed and that he had a perfect right, if he wanted to, to sentence Col. Stewart to death; that he did not intend to do it, but that he had the constitutional right to do so.

* * * * * * *

Speaking for my country and not for my party, speaking for the autonomy and stability of our institutions, speaking for the Constitution, in all of its parts, if we are to pass in again under his yoke, with his outstretched arm under his latest utterance hanging over the seat of justice, the refuge and bulwark of our institutions, ready to strike it down with a wanton attack upon its integrity, and if this attack is to succeed and the era of the common law is to be revived, when its judges were the abject serfs and slaves of the crown, then, in my judgment, it would have been better if the Constitution had never been framed and its authors had never attempted by an apportionment of constitutional functions almost perfect in their allotment to construct an indissoluble union of indestructible States.

Those who knew not Senator RAYNER in his home life knew not the Senator at his best. It was here he shone with all his tenderness, with all his love, and with that great devotion which he ever exhibited for his loved ones. His home life was ideal. He possessed those domestic virtues which stand for the integrity of the American home, the corner stone of American institutions. Within the sheltering privacy of the family circle was revealed those lovable traits of his sterling character that will ever endear his memory to his friends. None who enjoyed access to that circle could fail to approximate him at his true worth. Here the formalities of official position were forgotten and he was to be seen in the more treasured rôle of husband, father, companion, or host.

His addresses were always in eager demand. The mere announcement that he would speak was sufficient to command a large audience. They came to gather knowledge from his lips, to revel in the delight his oration afforded, to witness the fearless freedom and ease with which he handled his subject. Such an occasion was a mental feast none could fail to relish.

His last public address was in the Lyric Theater, in Baltimore, where, on October 7, 1912, he met the Hon. W. Bourke Cockran in joint debate on the issues of the late campaign. His effort was a splendid one and added to his reputation, but even then the invisible and blighting hand of death was upon him. More than one of his admirers left the hall that night shaking their heads, solemnly averring:

The Senator was not his best this evening.

His address lacked just enough of that sparkling keenness which always distinguished his utterances to render it noticeable. The old-time fire was not in his words and actions. Those who observed his subdued vigor mentally and physically little dreamed that the tumult of the great national campaign then raging, in which with pain-racked body he was heroically doing his part, hardly would have subsided ere this favorite and beloved son of Maryland would have laid him down to his final sleep.

Like Wolfe at Quebec, he lived long enough to see the banners of that army in which he was a valiant and trusted leader wreathed with the garlands of victory. The flush of success doubtless gave him new lease of life, though brief. It must have been a source of extreme pleasure to him in his last days that his countrymen, accepting his appraisement of our Federal Constitution as correct, had by an overwhelming majority voted to preserve the integrity of that document whose surpassing worth and splendidly balanced unity had been his chosen theme on more than one occasion.

We hear the dip of the golden oars
And catch a gleam of the snowy sail,
And, lo, they have passed from our yearning heart;
They cross the stream and are gone for aye.
We may not sunder the veil apart
That hides from our vision the gates of day;
We only know that their bark no more
May sail with us o'er life's stormy sea.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the remarks of Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, Chaplain of the Senate and pastor of All Souls Unitarian Church of Washington, at the funeral of Senator RAYNER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing the address referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The address of Dr. Pierce is as follows:

"Once more, in the providence of God, we stand with bowed head and with hushed voices in the ineffable presence of death. Labor as we will to school and discipline ourselves, we can not so stultify ourselves as to be insensible to the majesty and augustness of this solemn hour. Repress our utterance as we may, the heart will find some secret and silent language to voice our awe and our faith. We are not so hardened and calloused that, as we journey on the highway of life, we can stay the tears as we behold—

"The milestones into headstones changed,
"'Neath every one a friend.

"And at such a time, when the occasion breathes its own thought, how little we can do! When, as of yore, the Spirit with its tongues of fire seems to descend upon us and to speak to each one in his own language, how cold and empty seems all that we can say! How well-nigh impertinent seem our words of praise! They seem to cut and wound hardly less than words of blame. And we would not have it otherwise. For we know the grief that is in our hearts, however our lips may fail in utterance.

"We speak sometimes of the silent tribute of tears. Are we not wiser than we suspect when we use such words? Why should we disguise the matter? Why should we attempt to conceal what our very presence here says so plainly? The simple truth is that our own deep sense of loss is the highest tribute we can pay to him who has gone from us. And who does not feel that this loss is personal? Not to everyone is it given thus to endear himself to all who knew him. And our own sense of personal loss is a true measure of his greatness.

"It is just as so often happens in our ordinary walk of life. We rejoice in the tree whose strength and beauty have been our admiration. Under its shade we found shelter. We were nourished by its fruits. But not until storm or tempest or the ruthless ax of the woodman has laid its prostrate form before us do we know its true proportions. We sometimes call death the great leveler; and so it is. But is not death also the great revealer? And now that the long and honorable career of public service and private life is brought to a close we realize, as never before, how blessed we have been and how great is the loss we suffer.

"Did I say public service and private life? Alas, these are sometimes separate and distinct things. But with the true man public service and private life grow from the same root of faithful devotion to duty. To such a man his public life is only an extension of his private character; it is a sharing with the larger family of the city, State, or Nation of those qualities which make home a sacred place. To such private life is not a screen where he would hide aught, but it is the smaller area into which are concentrated as by a sunglass the love and devotion which the larger public has shared and rejoiced in. No wonder, then, that when we are called to part with such a man home and city and State and Nation should each feel its own loss to be supreme. The larger family of the public mourns him as an honored and faithful servant of the common good; the family circle mourn for him as husband and father, and mourn as they only can who were privileged to share with him the sanctities of the home.

"And yet, as was said, here are not two lives, but one life. Public service and private life grew from the same divine root. Faithfulness to duty, dependence upon God, there is no fruitage of the Spirit that can not grow from this. Is not this the meaning of the poet's great words—

"Yea, let all good things await Him who cares not to be great
But as he saves or serves the State.
Not once or twice in our fair country's story
The path of duty was the way to glory.
He, that ever following her commands,
On with toil of heart and knees and hands,
Thro' the long gorge to the far light has won
His path upward, and prevail'd,
Shall find the toppling crags of Duty scaled
Are close upon the shining table-lands
To which our God himself is moon and sun.

"Duty—heaven; by a beautiful necessity does not the one lead always to the other? When, like Jacob of old, we go faithfully on our way, is it not then that the angels of God meet us? And when in our pilgrimage we tarry at a certain place because the sun of life is set, do we not in the morning find this to be none other than the house of God, this to be the gate of heaven? When we know that to live is Christ, then, also, we know that to die is gain. And when we speak of our deep loss we are speaking of ourselves, not of him. If our sense of loss is the measure of his great worth, so also is it the measure of his gain. For it is true beyond peradventure that—

"Virtue treads paths that end not in the grave;
No bar of endless night exiles the brave;
And to the saner mind
We rather seem the dead that stay behind.

"It is, then, for ourselves that we mourn, knowing our great loss, while he has ascended to his Father and to our Father, to his God and to our God.

"And, indeed, when one has come into the world richly endowed, when he has trained and disciplined his mind and has submitted all to the Father of our spirits, when a man has unsparingly given himself for others and has counted not his own life dear unto himself if only he may work the work of Him who sent him while it is called day, and when at the last his every thought has been not for self, but for others, why should not such a soul be able to say, with the apostle, 'I have fought the good fight, I have finished the course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me the crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give to me at that day'? And can we doubt that even now the liberated spirit of such a man has heard the approving words, 'Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord'?"

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, in a few words I wish to state the view held by the people of Maryland of the Hon. ISIDOR RAYNER, their late representative in the Senate. He was distinctively, as has been said, a statesman. And by this, of course, they meant to designate an unswerving and unusual spirit of loyalty to national interests as well as the interests of Maryland. It is undeniable that the citizen has two sets of rights and interests: In one of his relations he is purely an individual with corresponding claims direct upon his fellows; in another he is a member in a great State or national cooperative organization, where his rights and interests are collective in character and depend for the protection and enjoyment upon the degree of wisdom and loyalty exhibited by his representatives in official life. It is in the latter relation that Senator RAYNER was best known to our people, and it is a great pleasure to testify to their high appreciation of his signal devotion and very great ability in serving them.

There can be no question of his unyielding courage and fixity of purpose in this respect. The history of all parts of our country has been practically alike since the war, and all understand the terrific power wielded by those whose interests were individual and opposed in character to the collective interests, and how too many have yielded—even great political parties have succumbed—to individual interests which have had the power to set aside the collective interests in favor of their own. In such a situation the loyalty of ISIDOR RAYNER was always invincible, for he was a statesman and not one of those who look to the actions of individuals rather than to the collective organization of society for their applause and protection.

With this great spirit of loyalty to public interests there was combined a degree of talent in advocacy which amounted to genius itself. I shall not need to recite his life's story or the commanding incidents of his public career. They have been presented by others. But Maryland was proud, almost immoderately proud, of his prowess in debate. She had had others in this House or the Senate of whose brilliancy she was proud; and the Nation was proud. He sustained, and splendidly sustained, her past glory and brought her added glory with the recurring years. She knew how to judge and compare great men in the public service. For had she not reared at least her share and devoted them to the Nation's service? There was Pinckney; there was Henry Winter Davis; and then ISIDOR RAYNER.

He has gone with them, but his glory remains here with theirs. It is good and is as imperishable as the spirit of loyalty to the public.

Mr. KONIG. Mr. Speaker, ISIDOR RAYNER is dead. His work is done. Our action to-day can neither brighten nor tarnish his fame. But, sir, the beauty of the custom is its defense—to gather here in the workshop of a departed worker and here on the day of rest for those of us who are still in the struggle remind one another of the accomplishments of him who has gone to his eternal rest.

Senator RAYNER was a leader in the Senate; he was a leader in the House; he was a leader at the bar of Maryland. Wherever he served, there he led; and he led because he deserved to lead. Endowed with a genius for oratory, imbued with high ambition, gifted with strong intelligence and remarkable industry, and possessed of great wealth, Senator RAYNER soon took his place among the men at the top.

But, Mr. Speaker, I revere the memory of ISIDOR RAYNER not because he got to the top, but I revere his memory because wherever he served he served with fidelity and honesty. Men deserve honor only as they are faithful and honest, albeit they may have fame and notoriety as they are successful. But for a vagary of fortune the unknown sailor at the mast might have been the famed admiral on the bridge, and the obscure soldier in the ranks might have been the heralded general at the front, the sweating toiler the proud captain of industry, and the humble voter the exalted magistrate. Fortune favors, and we are famous; fortune frowns, and we are obscure.

Whether fortune enables us to become famous or keeps us obscure, we have it within us to say whether we shall be honest or dishonest, faithful or unfaithful; and accordingly as we choose do we deserve the approval or the disapproval of our fellow men. And, after all, what difference does it make whether we are remembered with the world's great men or forgotten with its men unknown? It may well be that we all in playing our little parts are but deceiving ourselves with our seriousness; that we, with our heavy trifling, are the sport of some genius to us as inconceivable as it is unknown.

But, taking ourselves as we find ourselves, there is no man with an ambition to attain anything who does not as soon as he attains it finds himself possessed of an ambition to attain something else above and beyond it, and the which if he does not attain leaves him as much unsatisfied as if his first ambition had not been realized. Such is the nature of human effort and ambition; perhaps it is well that it is so.

This fact of human history teaches us all a lesson, no matter what may be our station in life, our lot, or our fortune; if we do our duty honestly and faithfully we need envy no man, no matter what his wealth or what his position. There is no top rung to the ladder. Position, wealth, and parts are not in themselves happiness, but, on the contrary, they are oftentimes sources of unhappiness. The wise man tempers his ambition with contentment.

ISIDOR RAYNER served his country well and faithfully; let us pray God that we may do likewise. The great majority of us can not hope to be as famed as Senator RAYNER, but we all can hope and endeavor to leave behind us that which our late lamented friend left behind him, a reputation for honesty and fidelity.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Members of the Maryland delegation and of the House have one week in which to print remarks on the subject of the life, character, and public services of the late Senator RAYNER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent that the Members of the House from Maryland and other Members of the House have unanimous consent to print remarks in the RECORD at any time within one week. If there be no objection it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

And then, in accordance with the resolution previously adopted and as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Senator RAYNER, the House (at 12 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow, Monday, February 3, 1913, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 3, 1913.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

Mr. BACON took the chair as President pro tempore under the order of the Senate of December 16, 1912.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last, when, on request of Mr. CULLOM and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CULLOM. Out of order, I ask leave to call up the bill (S. 8182) granting to the Inter City Bridge Co., its successors and assigns, the right to construct, acquire, maintain, and operate a railway bridge across the Mississippi River. It will take only a minute to pass it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have just entered the Chamber. Is there a request for the present consideration of this bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to have an opportunity to examine it before it is put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Iowa that the bill has been taken up by unanimous consent, but that does not——

Mr. CULLOM. I am willing that the bill shall go over if the Senator from Iowa wants to look at it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over upon the request of the Senator from Iowa.

SENATORS FROM TENNESSEE AND TEXAS.

Mr. SANDERS presented the credentials of WILLIAM ROBERT WEBB, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Tennessee a Senator from that State for the remainder of the term ending March 3, 1913, in the room and stead of NEWELL SANDERS, heretofore appointed by the governor of Tennessee as the successor of Robert L. Taylor, deceased, which were read and ordered to be filed.

Mr. CULBERSON presented the credentials of MORRIS SHEPPARD, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Texas a Senator from that State for the unexpired portion of the term of Hon. Joseph W. Bailey ending March 3, 1913, which were read and ordered to be filed.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator elect from Texas is present and ready to take the oath of office.

Mr. LEA. The Senator elect from Tennessee is in the Chamber and ready to take the oath of office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senators elect will present themselves at the desk for that purpose.

Mr. SHEPPARD and Mr. WEBB advanced to the Vice President's desk, escorted by Mr. CULBERSON and Mr. LEA, respectively, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to them, they took their seats in the Senate.
